Book on Dead Sea Scrolls: Three of the original Dead Sea Scrolls and about 100 rare artifacts from the biblical period in Israel are being shown at the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull, Que., from Dec. 5 to April 12, 2004.

The exhibition, "Ancient Treasures and the Dead Sea Scrolls," was organized by the Israel Museum, Jerusalem, in collaboration with the Montreal Museum of Archaeology and History at Pointe-à-Callière, where many of the items were previously on display.

Those who plan to view this rare showing of biblical-era artifacts outside Israel may wish to prepare by reading The Meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls: Their Significance for Understanding the Bible, Judaism, Jesus and Christianity. Edited by James VanderKam and Peter Flint, this useful compendium of articles was published recently by HarperCollins.

For years, interested observers have found it hard to gain a focus on the scrolls because there was no academic consensus about them and so much remained hidden behind a cloak of secrecy. Now, as this engaging book makes clear, a broader and more confident picture is emerging. The book offers an excellent summary of developments from 1990 to 2002, the golden period of scrolls-related scholarship and publication.

Journalist uses life experiences to help others

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Journalist and author Ellie Tesher has lived through many experiences and traumas in her life and is using her insights to help others.

A syndicated columnist whose column "Ellie," which advises people on questions about love, marriage, friends and family and appears in 10 newspapers across Canada and in Chicago, says she believes you can successfully overcome all kinds of obstacles.

Tesher has gone on record in the past about her traumas and experiences, which include a childhood with a troubled/depressive mother, young marriage and divorce, single parenthood, children reacting to divorce, a mixed marriage, a parent with Alzheimer's, "step parenthood" and various career challenges.

Born in Toronto, Tesher graduated from the University of Toronto with a major in sociology and worked as a social worker with Children's Aid Society, where she managed the cases of some 50 foster children removed from their parents' homes. This was good preparation for the advice column, she says.

In the mid 1970s, the stay-at-home-mother began freelancing for The Canadian Jewish News and was later published in many magazines and newspapers. She was invited to join the Toronto Star staff in 1977.

During her 26-year career at the Star, Tesher has worked as a general assignment reporter, a feature writer, the editor of the Life, Food, Fashion and Home sections, and the editor of the Sunday Star. For the past eight years, she has focused on social justice issues.

Ellie Tesher

In 1999, she wrote the bestseller The Dionnes, about the identical Canadian quintuplets who were born during the Depression and brought millions of tourist dollars to Ontario.

In her book, Tesher revealed how the quintuplets, who successfully sued the Ontario government for financial redress for past mismanagement of their trust funds, were living their adult lives in poverty and isolation. As a result of its publication, the women were granted more than a million dollars each by the Ontario government.

Tesher says she writes it as she sees it.

"I have never in my years as a writer, editor or columnist been prevented from expressing my opinions on any issue and my Jewish identity when it is appropriate," she says, adding that her career has always been fresh and exciting.

"I had the opportunity to change what I was doing somewhat every five years and I always felt challenged in a positive way and I learned new things."

Tesher also wrote a relationship column for several years under a pseudonym for GTA Today, the city's commuter paper, now known as the Metro.

"People have always asked my for advice," she says. "Several years ago, when a replacement for Ann Landers was being sought in Chicago, it first struck me that I could do this."

She didn't pursue the idea then because she didn't feel she was ready. But when Landers died last year, Tesher realized it was the right time for her to move into that area. She expressed her interest to the publisher of the Star, John Honderich.

"He flashed back a positive response and now my syndicated column appears here and in the United States."

Tesher, who is a frequent guest on television and radio shows and makes many public appearances, says growing up she felt like an outsider.

"My mother had depressions and five nervous breakdowns so I did not have a strong mother image. [She] died three years ago and I realize that somehow, she had the right values and always transmitted them to me."

Her father, Phillip W. Goldman, whose mother died when he was nine years old, rose in the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association and was the president of Shoppers Drug Mart for nine years.

"My father was a strong image for me and my brother and a great public speaker. Our home was geared to education and decent values."

Today, Tesher is the mother of two children and three stepchildren. She says she and her husband Vian Ewart, a senior editor at the Star, lead busy lives, but they make sure to spend time together.

"We come home together and we cook together," she says. "We are health conscious and we eat a lot of fresh fruit, vegetables and fish."

Tesher says she relies on a large list of resource people, books, Web sites and community resources to help her readers, most of whom send their questions by e-mail.

"I try to answer as many as possible and I try to balance the mix," she says.

Film grapples with Nazi past

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Germany's Nazi legacy, and the intergenerational conflicts it inspires, are the overlapping themes of Bronstein's Children, a German feature film to be presented by the Goethe Institut in conjunction with Holocaust Education Week on Tuesday, Nov. 4 at 7 p.m.

The screening will take place at Kinowelt Hall, 163 King St. West.

Adopted from a novel by Jurek Becker, this 1990 movie, directed by Jerzy Kawalerowicz, turns on the abduction of a former concentration camp guard and on the tense relationship between a Jewish Holocaust survivor and his somewhat rebellious teenage son.

The film, set in East Berlin in 1973, flashes back and forth between the present and the past.

Arno Bronstein (Armin Muller-Stahl) and his two friends have kidnapped Arnold Heppner, the guard, and have tied him to a bed in a rural cottage. They threaten to torture him unless he confesses to his crimes.

They are convinced Heppner shot and killed concentration camp inmates. They have kidnapped him because they do not believe East Germany's judicial system will convict a Nazi war criminal.

Shackled to a bed, Heppner is a frightened, grizzled and pathetic-looking figure.

Hans, Bronstein's 19-year-son, has misgivings about his father's decision to kidnap Heppner. At one point, he even considers freeing Heppner, who supposedly regrets what happened under the Nazis.

Hans, whose constant companion is a comely young woman, also refuses to be labelled as "a son of a victim of fascism." But he cannot repress the past, which continually haunts Arno.

Film trembles with controversy

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Every once in a while you run across a film that makes you think or stirs up controversy. There have been several of these in the past few years – The Believer, Capturing the Friedmans and a film that has just been released on video and DVD – Trembling Before G-d.

Until Trembling Before G-d was on the festival circuit and in theatres, few people gave much thought to the problems faced by observant Jews who happen to be gay.

Then director Sandi Simcha Dubowski decided to face the problem head on. As a gay Jew who loved his religion and its traditions, he brought the difficulties faced by observant Jewish members of the gay community to everyone's attention. The film played at the Sundance Film Festival in 2001 and has won numerous awards, including the Teddy Award for Best Documentary at the 2001 Berlin International Film Festival.

Dubowski spent several years tracking down observant Jews who were willing to talk on camera about their homosexuality. Even then, some of them refused to allow their faces to be shown or their full names to be used.

The fact that such people even existed in the community was probably a shock to many Jews. But what was probably even more surprising was the passion and determination of these gay Jews to retain the customs and traditions they grew up with and their love of Judaism and the Jewish people – despite the antagonism they felt from their families and friends after they went public with their sexual orientation.

It is heart-rending to watch these individuals try to reconnect with their parents and family members. It is also painful to hear others who have not come out of the closet relate their fears of how their loved ones will react if they do.

Trembling Before G-d is a fascinating and emotional study of people trying to retain their connections with their families and with a way of life they truly love, despite being ostracized and virtually exiled from their community.

Though people have had different reactions to this film, I have never been to a screening where members of the audience weren't touched by it and where it didn't lead to hours of heated discussion.

Trembling Before G-d has been released in Canada by Mongrel Media. The two-disc DVD contains some three hours of bonus material, including Trembling On The Road, a 40-minute short feature describing the reaction from screenings around the world and updates on characters who appeared in the film; a 21-minute interview with the director; Mark: The Musical, a music video that is based on what MTV would do if it produced a spiritual music video; a conversation with editor and director Susan Korda; and much more, including subtitles in Spanish, Hebrew and Yiddish.

German film grapples with Nazi past

In a subplot, Arno's daughter, Elle, who was hidden by strangers during World War II, has been committed to a mental institution. It is unclear why she is there, but one can safely assume she was traumatized by the war.

Hans visits her on a regular basis, but Arno seems estranged from his daughter. The few scenes in which Elle appears are not uninteresting, but they add little to Bronstein's Children, which tends to hold the viewer's attention.

On Nov. 5 at 7 p.m., the 1920 silent film The Golem will be screened by the Goethe Institut. The Golem, which unfolds in 16th century Prague, is a doom-laden, menacing classic.

Jews in pro hockey: a 2003-04 update

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The most prominent Jewish player in the National Hockey League this season won't be Detroit Red Wings' defenceman Mathieu Schneider or Washington Capitals' centre Jeff Halpern.

Instead, it's likely to be commissioner Gary Bettman, who will face off with NHL players' association executive director Bob Goodenow to try to reach a new collective bargaining agreement before next season.

If both these Ivy League-educated lawyers can't resolve the stalemate between players and owners by next September, chances are that there won't be a "Jews in pro hockey" article like this one next year, or for some time to come.

Right now, it appears that Schneider, 34, and Halpern are the only two Jewish skaters in the NHL who seem to be relatively secure with their present teams. But make no mistake, there are plenty of skaters champing at the bit.

Schneider, at $3.5 million (US), is the highest paid Jewish hockey player of all time. The Red Wings also paid a high price to acquire the veteran rearguard from Los Angeles at the trading deadline last year, surrendering a pair of young minor leaguer hopefuls plus first- and second-round draft picks.

Schneider last year enjoyed his third 50-point season in his 14-year career, garnering 16 goals and 34 assists in 78 games.

I hesitate to suggest that the power-play specialist might be losing a step or two, since his sister-in-law Michelle Schneider took exception to my assessment of her brother-in-law when she read my hockey column last winter in the Jewish Star Times of Miami.

She wrote: "He is not winding down his career. He was out last season with a groin injury. It can take quite a while to come back from this type of [problem]. Mathieu has always played with grit and determination and is in no way winding down."

Not including playoffs, the New York native – who shoots left-handed, stands six feet tall and weighs 190 pounds – has played in 914 games with the Islanders, Leafs, Rangers, Canadiens, Kings and Red Wings.

Halpern, 27, is a local hero who was inducted into the Greater Washington Jewish Sports Hall of Fame. The Princeton grad, who often plays on the Capitals' checking line, was one of only a handful of NHL players to play in all of his team's 82-regular season games last season.

He is always at his best as a penalty killer and is often used against the other teams' top lines. Such assignments come at the expense of his offensive output. Last season he had only 13 goals and 21 assists.

The Washington organization exercised their option in June on the 6-foot, 200-pound Halpern, who earns just over $1 million (US) per season. This season is therefore a pivotal one for the checker, who is described as being "on the bubble."

Veteran centre Steve Dubinsky, 33, who played last season in six games with the American Hockey League's Worcester IceCats and in 28 with the NHL's St. Louis Blues, is a Group Three unrestricted free agent who has yet to be signed. He has played 375 games in the NHL and hopes to amass another 25 to reach the all-important 400 mark for superior pension benefits.

There are also another five Jewish players at the AHL level who might be recalled by their parent clubs in the event of injuries.

Andrew "Bubba" Berenzweig, a 26-year-old fifth-round Islanders draft pick, was left unprotected by Dallas in the recent October NHL waiver draft and went unclaimed. The 6-2, 215-pound defenceman is now in the AHL with the Utah Grizzlies. He played several games last season with the Nashville Predators.

Also left unclaimed was Edmonton Oilers' property, Michael Henrich, 23, a former first-round selection, 13th overall. The winger, who has yet to realize his full potential, last year played overseas in Sweden and was later loaned to Hershey of the AHL. This season, the right-winger is with the new AHL franchise in Toronto, the Roadrunners.

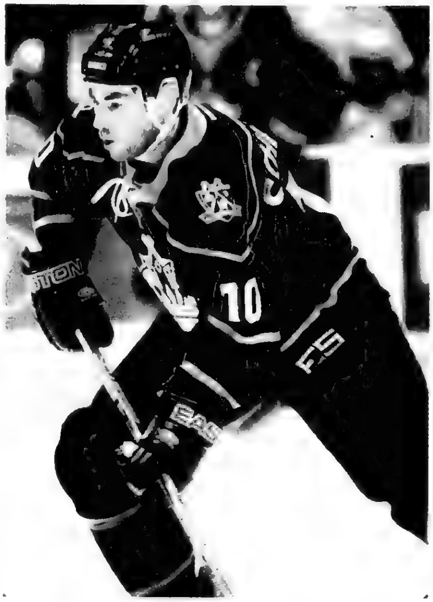
Max Birbraer, 23, formerly the property of the New Jersey Devils and who played left wing with the Albany River Rats of the AHL, is now in the Florida Panthers chain and will begin the season with the AHL's San Antonio Rampage. The Kazakhstan native, who once played in Israel, scored six goals and added six assists last year with Albany.

Cory Pecker, 22, who was drafted in 1999 by Calgary Flames, is now in the Anaheim chain playing with Cincinnati of the AHL The centre was a scoring star in junior, recording 53 goals and 46 assists in only 56 games in his final year with the Erie Otters of the Ontario Hockey League. With Cincinnati last season, he scored 20 goals in his rookie pro campaign.

Dave Hymowitz, 29, is in Binghamton with the Ottawa Senators number 1 farm club for his second season. The left winger had 15 goals and 19 assists last year.

Adam Henrich, Michael's brother and a second-round draft pick of the Tampa Bay Lightning, is back as alternate captain with the Brampton Battalion of the OHL. The 6-4, 214-pound left winger fired 31 goals and added 33 assists last season.

Goalie Robert Gherson, 20, Washington's fifth round pick in 2002, enjoyed a 26-12-7 record with a 2.78 goals-against average with the Sarnia Sting of the OHL last year. He is back with the same club this year.



Mathieu Schneider

Eric Himelfarb, 20, scored 31 goals and added 44 helpers with Barrie Colts of the OHL last season. The diminutive forward was a sixth-round selection of Montreal in 2001, but the Canadiens never signed him. This fall, he attended the Ottawa Senators rookie camp, then ended up again in the OHL, this time with the Kingston Frontenacs.

Former NHL stalwart Bob Nystrom's son Eric, a first round pick, number 10 overall, by Calgary in 2002, is playing at the University of Michigan. The winger played 39 games and recorded 15 goals and 11 assists last season.

David Nemirovsky, a Toronto born centre who has played in 91 NHL games and scored 16 NHL goals, is playing for Jokerit, Helsinki, where last winter he potted 18 goals and had 23 assists in 56 games.

Winnipeg's Jacob Micflikier, a forward, scored 31 goals and had 36 assists in 59 games with Sioux Falls of the United States Hockey League last season. He is set to play at the University of New Hampshire this season.

Lower minor league hopefuls also out there to watch for are: Aaron Brand (Port Huron Beacons, United Hockey League), Shawn Mamane and Harold Hersh (Granby Predateurs, Quebec Senior Professional Hockey League), Jamie Sokolsky (University of Western Ontario), Jeff Dessner (Cologne Sharks, German Ice Hockey League), Aaron Fox (Clarkson Golden Knights, Eastern College Athletic Conference), Justin Kearns (Toledo Elite Hockey League) and Greg Gardner (Mississippi Sea Wolves, East Coast Hockey League).

An inspirational Yom Tov

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The High Holy Days of 5764 represented a significant and welcome stopover on my spiritual roadmap.

I was hired to lead services for a group called The Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC), a well-organized congregation composed of a circle of spiritual travellers living in east Toronto.

The chalutznikim (pioneers) of the DJC were Jewish-hippy in nature, in pursuit of a creatively spiritual environment open to all those who wanted to participate in Jewish ritual, prayer and community. They wanted to be eclectic in their choice of liturgy, egalitarian in leadership and actions, and unaffiliated with any specific denomination so that the group could fly according to the call of its soul.

This past yom tov, I discovered that the founding members had succeeded in their quest.

The success of the DJC was evident throughout the High Holy Days. Between 200 and 500 people attended the services. The congregation was composed of a healthy mixture of Jews from all backgrounds, intermarried couples, gay and lesbian partners, singles and families.

Everyone's presence was honoured. The language from the bimah openly and invitingly included messages of embrace and shared experiences, such as Crystal Kleitch's witty dvar Torah on her recent conversion to Judaism, and her husband Avrum's invitation to medical professionals (who helped our city through SARS) to make the brachot on the Torah.

Nothing was masked. Everyone was received into the DJC with the warmth and inclusiveness one always hoped religion would be all about.

Mostly, for me, the road that I followed on yom tov 5764 was a creative one full of explanation and inspiration. Kol Nidre was gracefully performed by world-class musicians and singers.

The prayer binder was a methodically researched compendium of traditional prayers such as Unitaneh Tokef, Al Chait and Avinu Malkeinu. It also included silent meditation (with instructions), stories, poetry, prose readings and illumination of concepts such as introspection and kindness.

The Mishebeirach prayer, a blessing of wellness, hauntingly sung by board member and singer Lisa Kent, pierced my core the way Irish pop-balladeer Sinead O'Connor does. The entire shul was still.

Bar and bat mitzvah youngsters were invited to participate. And the shofar blowing was an explosive duet, I must say, between co-founding member Richard Chardish and me.

While I am aware of and empathize with those who suffer through the agonizing and inherently exclusionary debates of Who is a Jew?, I was equally relieved to have found a gentle and inclusive congregation in the DJC.

I respect the millennia of scholarship required to create the siddur and mainstream services, but I was also thrilled to have discovered an attempt by the DCJ to craft a new approach to liturgy, in which explanation of prayer is equally as important as its recitation.

For me, the DJC was a gulp of spiritual fresh air, one I had been gasping for, for a very long time now. It welcomed my creativity and offered me a magical and imaginative Jewish community driven by a mighty ideological passion to unearth the truth within Judaism. The DJC introduced me to its childlike ruach (spirit), like that of a kid who is friends with everybody.

Mostly, however the Danforth Jewish Circle helped me grow as a Jew. Well done and thanks for stopping to pick me up by the side of the road.

"Deep down in me I knowed it was a lie, and He knowed it. You can't pray a lie – I found that out." – Mark Twain

About Life

Dear Ella,

I was recently at a convention with many colleagues from across North America.

One of my acquaintances came up to me to catch up on how I've been doing. He started the conversation with a big slap on the shoulder and said, "Bernie, how ya doin'? Gee, you've really put on some weight eh?"

I was shocked and speechless, which I rarely am. It wasn't till I walked away that I suddenly came up with 10 different comeback lines to put him in his place. It ruined my day and it bothered me for a very long time.

I happen to be going through a difficult period in my life and I didn't need that to make me feel just that much worse. What should I have said to this guy that would have made me feel better?

Speechless

Dear Speechless,

We share this planet with all kinds of people. Some with class and some without.

This guy had no idea what his comment would do to your self-esteem. It was simply an ice-breaker to start a conversation.

Unfortunately. we have no control over someone else's words. There is nothing you could have done to prevent him from coming out with that line.

Your only choice was, as you stated earlier, to come up with a quick reply to put him in his place, or to ignore what he said and move on.

I would choose the latter for two reasons. First, it is usually difficult to come up with a good comeback until after the incident, and second, that brings you to his level, a place you shouldn't want to be.

By changing your facial expression from friendly to serious, and abruptly stopping the conversation, you will give him the message that something went wrong. Unless he is very shallow, he will at least think about it for a minute.

As for you Bernie, this guy obviously hit a serious nerve for you. This comment runs deeper than just bad manners. Now the control is in your ball park.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The High Holy Days of 5764 represented a significant and welcome stopover on my spiritual roadmap.

I was hired to lead services for a group called The Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC), a well-organized congregation composed of a circle of spiritual travellers living in east Toronto.

The chalutznikim (pioneers) of the DJC were Jewish-hippy in nature, in pursuit of a creatively spiritual environment open to all those who wanted to participate in Jewish ritual, prayer and community. They wanted to be eclectic in their choice of liturgy, egalitarian in leadership and actions, and unaffiliated with any specific denomination so that the group could fly according to the call of its soul.

This past yom tov, I discovered that the founding members had succeeded in their quest.

The success of the DJC was evident throughout the High Holy Days. Between 200 and 500 people attended the services. The congregation was composed of a healthy mixture of Jews from all backgrounds, intermarried couples, gay and lesbian partners, singles and families.

Everyone's presence was honoured. The language from the bimah openly and invitingly included messages of embrace and shared experiences, such as Crystal Kleitch's witty dvar Torah on her recent conversion to Judaism, and her husband Avrum's invitation to medical professionals (who helped our city through SARS) to make the brachot on the Torah.

Nothing was masked. Everyone was received into the DJC with the warmth and inclusiveness one always hoped religion would be all about.

Mostly, for me, the road that I followed on yom tov 5764 was a creative one full of explanation and inspiration. Kol Nidre was gracefully performed by world-class musicians and singers.

The prayer binder was a methodically researched compendium of traditional prayers such as Unitaneh Tokef, Al Chait and Avinu Malkeinu. It also included silent meditation (with instructions), stories, poetry, prose readings and illumination of concepts such as introspection and kindness.

The Mishebeirach prayer, a blessing of wellness, hauntingly sung by board member and singer Lisa Kent, pierced my core the way Irish pop-balladeer Sinead O'Connor does. The entire shul was still.

Bar and bat mitzvah youngsters were invited to participate. And the shofar blowing was an explosive duet, I must say, between co-founding member Richard Chardish and me.

While I am aware of and empathize with those who suffer through the agonizing and inherently exclusionary debates of Who is a Jew?, I was equally relieved to have found a gentle and inclusive congregation in the DJC.

I respect the millennia of scholarship required to create the siddur and mainstream services, but I was also thrilled to have discovered an attempt by the DCJ to craft a new approach to liturgy, in which explanation of prayer is equally as important as its recitation.

For me, the DJC was a gulp of spiritual fresh air, one I had been gasping for, for a very long time now. It welcomed my creativity and offered me a magical and imaginative Jewish community driven by a mighty ideological passion to unearth the truth within Judaism. The DJC introduced me to its childlike ruach (spirit), like that of a kid who is friends with everybody.

Mostly, however the Danforth Jewish Circle helped me grow as a Jew. Well done and thanks for stopping to pick me up by the side of the road.

"Deep down in me I knowed it was a lie, and He knowed it. You can't pray a lie – I found that out." – Mark Twain

About Life

Dear Ella,

I was recently at a convention with many colleagues from across North America.

One of my acquaintances came up to me to catch up on how I've been doing. He started the conversation with a big slap on the shoulder and said, "Bernie, how ya doin'? Gee, you've really put on some weight eh?"

I was shocked and speechless, which I rarely am. It wasn't till I walked away that I suddenly came up with 10 different comeback lines to put him in his place. It ruined my day and it bothered me for a very long time.

I happen to be going through a difficult period in my life and I didn't need that to make me feel just that much worse. What should I have said to this guy that would have made me feel better?

Speechless

Dear Speechless,

We share this planet with all kinds of people. Some with class and some without.

This guy had no idea what his comment would do to your self-esteem. It was simply an ice-breaker to start a conversation.

Unfortunately. we have no control over someone else's words. There is nothing you could have done to prevent him from coming out with that line.

Your only choice was, as you stated earlier, to come up with a quick reply to put him in his place, or to ignore what he said and move on.

I would choose the latter for two reasons. First, it is usually difficult to come up with a good comeback until after the incident, and second, that brings you to his level, a place you shouldn't want to be.

By changing your facial expression from friendly to serious, and abruptly stopping the conversation, you will give him the message that something went wrong. Unless he is very shallow, he will at least think about it for a minute.

As for you Bernie, this guy obviously hit a serious nerve for you. This comment runs deeper than just bad manners. Now the control is in your ball park.

The cupola of the Reichstag building and the Quadriga on top of the Brandenburg Gate are seen behind concrete pillars at the construction site for the Holocaust memorial in Berlin. Controversy erupted last week when one of the companies involved, Degussa, was prohibited from further work on the project because it had partly owned the firm that supplied Zyklon B poison gas to Nazi death camps. The memorial is slated to open in 2005. [RNS/Reuters photos]

Israel threatens world peace: EU poll

By ADAR PRIMOR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — European Union officials sought Monday to minimize the significance of a survey in which more Europeans named Israel as a threat to world peace than any other country, saying the question had been "misleading" and that the answers would not affect EU policy.

The EU poll, conducted in mid-October, found 59 per cent of EU citizens said "yes" when asked if Israel posed "a threat to peace in the world," more than the 53 per cent who believed Iran and North Korea were a threat.

On Sunday, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom rejected claims that the poll was proof of European anti-Semitism.

Shalom said the poll, due out Monday but leaked over the weekend to the Spanish daily El Pais, reflects the overexposure of Israel in European media.

"There's no comparing the amount of media exposure Israel gets in Europe compared to Iran or North Korea. The images broadcast from here have an impact, but we should not get exerted by it," he told Ha'aretz.

Shalom said a poll published a month ago in Europe showed a significant improvement in Israel's image in recent months.

"But who cares about such polls? Even though the previous poll might even be more accurate than the current one, it ended up on the back pages of the papers. They prefer to give big headlines when the news about Israel is negative."

Shalom said the latest survey results point to Europe's efforts – and particularly France's – to position itself as a counterweight to the United States.

"This isn't necessarily a matter of anti-Israel or pro-Palestinian. It's a much broader issue of expressing views different from the United States, to establish itself as a power," he said.

'Expand bilateral relations'

Canada's new envoy to Israel sets goals

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canada's new ambassador to Israel, Donald Sinclair, hopes to achieve two main objectives during his three-year term in Tel Aviv.

Sinclair, who was posted to the Canadian embassy in Israel in the 1980s as political first secretary, wants to expand Canada's bilateral relationship with Israel and help Israelis and Palestinians resolve their differences.

The 56-year-old seasoned diplomat, who has been stationed in Iran, Holland, Australia and Switzerland since joining the Department of Foreign Affairs 30 years ago, arrived in Israel on Sept. 11, the second anniversary of the Al Qaeda terrorist attacks on the United States.

CANADA

Alternate Polls

TORONTO — City councillor Howard Moscoe said he has arranged for haredi voters in his ward to cast ballots at alternate locations in the upcoming municipal election after a number objected to voting at polling stations in Catholic schools. Residents of poll district 21 in Moscoe's Ward 15 (Eglinton-Lawrence) are slated to vote Nov. 10 at Our Lady of Assumption Catholic School on Glenmount Avenue in the Bathurst and Lawrence area, or in advanced polls at Regina Mundi Catholic School. Instead, they can call Moscoe's office at 416-783-7474 for help to transfer their names to alternate polls at Bais Yaakov Elementary School at 15 Saranac Blvd. or Glen Park Public School at 101 Englemount Ave.

Grad Heads West

CALGARY — Winnipeg native Naomi Pfeffer, the first graduate of a program at Toronto's York University designed to attract young Jewish educators to Western Canada, began teaching this fall at the Calgary Jewish Academy. Pfeffer received a three-year scholarship from Jewish communities in Western Canada to cover tuition at York, where she earned a B.Ed. and certification as a Jewish studies teacher. In return, she agreed to teach at a Jewish day school in the West. The York program is run by the university's Jewish Teacher Education Program in partnership with the Western Canadian Coalition of Jewish Educators.

Heart Team in China

JERUSALEM — A team of 13 Israeli doctors and nurses returned home this week after a trip to China to help perform 20 heart surgeries on critically ill children in the cities of Hebei, in Shijiazhuang province, and Lanzahou, in Gansu province. The team, which was in China from Oct. 16 to Nov. 2, was sent by the Israeli organization Save a Child's Heart. It was headed by cardiovascular surgeon Arie Schachner of Holon's Wolfson Medical Center.

WorldPride in Israel

JERUSALEM — WorldPride 2005 will be hosted by the Jerusalem Open House (JOH), a centre for the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered community in Jerusalem. The location of the global celebration of gay culture – the second of its kind, following WorldPride 2000 in Rome – was approved at the 22nd annual conference of InterPride – the International Association of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgendered Pride Co-ordinators – last month in Montreal. Organizers envision a message of "optimism, tolerance and hope," said JOH executive director Hagai El-Ad.

Prayers for Zion

CHICAGO — Millions of Christians prayed for Israel on Sunday, Oct. 26 as evangelical churches around the world participated in the second "Day of Prayer and Solidarity With Israel," sponsored by the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews. Evangelical Christians have been among Israel's strongest supporters in recent years.

Survivors Sought

WASHINGTON, D.C. —The United States Holocaust Museum (USHM) is seeking survivors from displaced persons camps in France, Italy, Germany and Switzerland who were interviewed by David Boder, a psychology professor from the Illinois Institute of Technology. The interviews capture their immediate reactions to the Holocaust undiluted by time and mark the first time many spoke on record about their experiences. The USHM department of oral history hopes to re-interview them about their initial statements and contrast their original perspectives with their views today. Survivors can call Elizabeth Hedlund at 202-488-6133 or e-mail her at ehedlund@ushmm.org.

Oxford Prof Penalized

LONDON — An Oxford University science professor was suspended last week without pay for two months after rejecting a graduate student for being Israeli. Andrew Wilkie rejected an expression of interest from Tel Aviv University student Amit Duvshani in June, partly on grounds Duvshani had served in the Israel Defence Forces. Oxford announced it would suspend Wilkie, prompting him to resign his chair at Oxford's Pembroke College. The move does not prevent him from resuming normal teaching duties when his suspension ends.

Arrest Rattles Jews

MOSCOW — Russian Jewish leaders have expressed concern over last month's arrest of Jewish businessman Mikhail Khodorkovsky, the head of the Yukos oil corporation. Believed to be Russia's richest man, he faces charges on six counts, including tax evasion and theft of state property. His arrest came after more than three months of pressure on his firm in what is widely seen as a politically motivated case against a man who is helping to finance the campaigns of several opposition parties in the December parliamentary election.

Constitution to Refer to EU's 'Christian Roots'?

PARIS — Support is growing to include a reference to Europe's Christian roots in a first-ever European Union constitution in time for a December EU summit slated to put the finishing touches on a final document.

According to a questionnaire circulated among EU member and candidate states, Ireland, the Czech Republic, Slovakia and Malta have now joined Italy, Poland, Portugal and Spain in calling for a reference to Europe's historical and cultural Christian roots in the constitution's preamble.

The eight countries are still a minority in the EU, which will have 25 members as of May 1, 2004.

France and Belgium have been particularly vociferous in opposing the reference, and France has indicated it might use its veto power if support for the idea increases, making its inclusion in the constitution unlikely. President Jacques Chirac has said he will defend the lay character of the French state and will not accept a "religious reference" in the EU Constitution, the EU Observer reported last week.

The European Jewish Congress wants a reference to more recent history in the preamble. In a recent advertisement in the International Herald Tribune and Le Monde condemning EU states' approach to anti-Semitism, the EJC said the preamble "should state clearly that post-World War II Europe was founded on the pledge 'Never Again.'"

Israel advocate counters Finkelstein at U of T

By FRANCES KRAFT
and ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporters

Norman Finkelstein, the pro-Palestinian DePaul University political science professor who has been touring North American campuses to the dismay of many Jewish students, shared the stage last week at the University of Toronto with a Jerusalem-based Israel advocate in an event sponsored by U of T's Student Administrative Council (SAC).

David Olesker, who happened to be on a North American campus tour, was brought in from Chicago by Betar-Tagar, the youth wing of Herut-Likud. Jewish student representatives negotiated a format-change with SAC just days before Finkelstein's scheduled appearance, changing the event from a solo lecture to a debate titled "Israel & Palestine: Roots of the Conflict, Prospects for Peace."

"When I compare Finkelstein's performance at U of T to his [solo] performance at the University of Waterloo in June, this was definitely 'Finkelstein lite,'" said Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. At Waterloo, Rudner said, "I think it's fair to say he was insensitive, rude and... vicious" to pro-Israel audience members who asked questions.

The U of T event had a visible police presence, and moderator Susan Spratt, a negotiator for the Canadian Auto Workers union, made it clear that speakers and the almost 500 audience members at U of T's music building would have to respect the debate process and each other. Finkelstein, the son of Holocaust survivors, joked that her sternness brought back memories of his late mother.

Jewish students at U of T supported Finkelstein's right to speak, but they were "disturbed by his revisionist history," Hillel said in a statement.

Education tax credit repealed

TORONTO — In the face of an unexpected deficit of $5.6 billion, Ontario will have to undergo several cost-cutting measures, including the elimination of the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC), Premier Dalton McGuinty said last week.

In effect, McGuinty repeated his campaign pledge to repeal the credit, which provides tax relief for parents of children in private and faith-based schools.

"I am not here to tell you the cupboard is bare, to get out of our promises," he said. "I am here to tell you that we found something in the cupboard: a $5.6 billion Tory deficit. We are going to eliminate it so we can implement our promises."

The EETC is one of several initiatives facing the axe.

McGuinty's remarks came less than 24 hours after former provincial auditor Erik Peters reported that Ontario faces a deficit of at least $5.6 billion, despite the Tories' claim that the budget was balanced.

Hours after the premier's address, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, issued a statement saying it was "greatly disappointed" to hear of the plan to repeal the EETC.

"To do so will be to return to the days of systemic discrimination against non-Catholic religious schools in Ontario," said CJC Ontario region chair Ed Morgan.

CJC has asked McGuinty to allow the credit to be used for this year so that parents of children in independent schools who have already budgeted their household expenditures with the credit in mind will not face undue hardship.

"For the government to repeal this tax credit without finding an alternative sends Ontario back to a time when this province was the only jurisdiction in the democratic world that gave special rights to one faith community while denying that right to all others," Morgan said.

Greater Toronto Area

Inspired by a philosopher

From the editor's desk

Holocaust Education Week, wherever it is commemorated in North America, falls at this time of the year because it is generally agreed that the violence and brutal, physical horror of the Holocaust began at this time of year on Kristallnacht.

Next week, on Nov. 9 and 10, we mark its 65th anniversary.

Nearly 30 years ago, I attended a symposium at the University of Toronto on the subject of "The Holocaust: Its Place in History." Three world-renowned scholars took part.

The presentation by one of them, Emil Fackenheim, remains, to this day, one of the best lectures I have ever heard.

It was a tour de force. In an absolutely brilliant analysis, he held us all spellbound. At times in a whisper, at times shaking his fist in anger, the ache in his heart poured forth.

I still recall the goosebumps, how I, and the capacity audience in the Convocation Hall, were transfixed, utterly silent, enveloped by the darkness of the large chamber and pierced by the professor's poignant cri de coeur.

Fackenheim died in Jerusalem on Sept 19. Every now and then, I return to the cassette recording of that U of T symposium to hear his words and voice again.

On the approaching eve of Kristallnacht's 65th anniversary, in the midst of Holocaust Education Week and just a few days after his shloshim, I publish barely a handful of some of his remarks.

Fackenheim wrote and spoke in beautifully literary English. That evening he was an orator, speaking with a passion and a defiance that I had rarely heard before, although, at the centre of his voice, there was still the familiar, tender humility that marked all his lectures.

He began the presentation with the "sad confirmation that the crime of the Holocaust had not yet been assimilated into the historical consciousness of the world.

"History has changed because of what was done to my people. The effect has been darkness. But if you do not face what happened, our situation is hopeless."

Never one to submit to hopelessness, Fackenheim undertook to try to answer two unanswerable questions about the Holocaust: How and why?

To answer the "how," he recounted and explained the changes that overtook the many layers of German society: the true believers, the bureaucrats, the petty thieves and then the ordinary folk.

Emil Fackenheim
(As he appeared in the mid-1970s)

"The passion of evil was not confronted by the passion of goodness…

"By deception, intimidation, blackmail and sheer brutality, the machinery [of death] was set in motion, the likes of which the world had not seen before and has not seen since.

"Historians, philosophers, theologians and ordinary men of the future will have to write the history as it really was. To do that [at this point, Fackenheim paused every so slightly, his voice rasping low] is a straight descent into hell."

To answer the "why," Fackenheim spoke of the "logic of the devil," which was how he described the ghoulish justifications and rationalizations of the Nazi mind. It was, he pointed out, genocide for purely ideological reasons, an ideology of hatred whose only products were factories of murder. Just before Hitler would take his own life in the bunker, he said, the Fuhrer gave two final orders: to continue with the murder of Jews and to flood the subways of Berlin, where Germans were hiding from the Allied bombs.

Fackenheim concluded his remarks in the following way: "A dark cloud still hangs over us and we don't know how to confront it. This eerie nothingness, which is something, this culmination of an explosion of hatred, which can be compared only to idolatry…

"We must learn to live with this cloud and try to understand it.

"Those who attempt that task [of trying to understand it] are helped by two rays of light.

"The first is the righteous gentile. Once you permitted yourself to go into the abyss of the Holocaust Kingdom, in which everything was perverted, so that evil was ordinary and [the] law, and that ordinary decency was miraculous, you find there is nothing less than a miracle - that there were people who were not perverted.

"The other ray of light… expressed itself in a public phenomenon. It's there for all of us to see. But we look around us and we find that few comprehend it.

"The surviving victims themselves, instead of lying down and dying in despair, exclaimed: 'We shall not die but live.' And the result of this unprecedented act of faith is something that, if the world understood, it would love: The State of Israel."

There was thunderous applause; the ovation lasted many minutes.

Since Fackenheim's death, many people have observed that he was one of the most important Jewish philosophers and thinkers of the 20th century.

As Kenneth Green elegantly wrote in The CJN obituary Sept. 25, "not only was he a great Jewish thinker, he was also a great Jew…

"What made Fackenheim unique and what impressed all those who knew and learned from him, was how he combined profundity of thought with personal integrity…

"He instructed us with his powerful ideas, he inspired us with the example of his life and he exhorted us to be better Jews."

May his memory be for a blessing.

Jews' honeymoon from anti-Semitism over: Amiel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff reporter

The venue was elegant and the keynote speaker chic and charming, delivering her address in a delicate British accent that belied its pointed message.

Several groups came in for a twist of the rhetorical knife as commentator Barbara Amiel skewered the government of Canada, the Liberal Party, Jewish leaders, Jewish voters, the United Nations and Israel's Arab opponents.

Barbara Amiel

The Jewish people's post-Holocaust "honeymoon" is over, Amiel told about 675 guests last week at a Maccabi Canada dinner at the Sheraton Centre honouring filmmaker Robert Lantos.

The West's guilt at the destruction of European Jewry has dissipated and anti-Semitism is again rearing its ugly head, she said. "The problem of the Jews is that we are expendable."

Amiel, a syndicated columnist who is married to newspaper publisher Conrad Black, traced the onset of the current wave of anti-Semitism to Nov. 10, 1975, the day the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution equating Zionism with racism.

Ironically, she noted, that date was the anniversary of Kristallnacht, the day in 1938 when Nazi mobs went on a rampage against Germany's Jews, smashing Jewish-owned stores and ushering in the Holocaust.

The UN resolution, though later rescinded, was "the official coming out in the postwar world of the vibrant anti-Semitism we're experiencing today," Amiel said.

"It has been reinstated in all but name by many resolutions passed by that odious body [the United Nations], and at [the 2001 UN World Conference Against racism in Durban, South Africa], it was taken up by NGOs," she said.

In the Arab world, the government-controlled press regularly describes Jews as pigs and apes and claims Jews use blood to bake Passover matzot, Amiel said, and Arab papers carrying those views can be found in London and Toronto.

As for the Canadian government, she said, it barely thinks about the Jews and when it does, it is not inclined to devote much energy to Jewish concerns.

"The world," Amiel said, "has reverted to its mild, comfortable anti-Semitism."

Today's variety of anti-Semitism can be seen in the boycott of Israel and its scientists, the attempts by the student union at York University to prevent academic Daniel Pipes from speaking, the unwillingness in anti-racism circles to see anti-Semitism as a form of racism and the teaching of Middle Eastern history from the perspective of far-left Israeli historians, she said.

A form of "pragmatic anti-Semitism" can be found in Canada's foreign policy, which sees Canada vote for or abstain on UN votes critical of Israel while hoping to mitigate its actions "by saying things would have been much, much worse if Canada was not around," Amiel said.

The UN, she continued, is a collection of failed states and opportunists, but "Ottawa mandarins love it and can strut around the world stage."

Canada's policy is camouflaged by claims of even-handedness, and while Israel is not immune from criticism, the government condemns Palestinian terrorism only when it also condemns Israeli soldiers for fighting it, Amiel said.

"Being even-handed between the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade and the Israel Defense Force is a foul joke. It is like being even-handed between heaven and hell."

She said the saddest part of the story is "the shame felt by some Jews about Israel," as if the intifadah was Israel's fault.

But, she said, no matter what policy Israel would adopt, nothing would change, because peace does not depend on Israeli politicians. "In Israel, even the hawks want peace. In the Arab world, even the doves want Israel destroyed."

To a smattering of applause, Amiel said the Liberal Party is no friend of Israel or of Jews, but Jews are slow to recognize this. She suggested that while Jews historically have had a mildly "small-l" liberal political tilt, today it is the Canadian Alliance that is most supportive of Israel.

Canadian Jews should consider supporting a new conservative party, Amiel said.

Jews must not remain silent in support of Israel's fight, she said. "Israel's survival is linked to us. If Israel disappears, Jews can't survive without being assimilated."

Anti-racism education should be mandatory: ex-neo-Nazi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

What can one person do to help stop hate?

According to Karen Mock, executive director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, there are three main areas in which to take action: the law, by lobbying and participating in letter-writing campaigns; public education; and coalition building with other faith and racial groups.

Mock was speaking to about 400 people at a recent Help Halt Hate panel discussion at Adath Israel Congregation, along with Elizabeth Moore, a former spokesperson for the white supremacist group Heritage Front, and Sister Mary Boys, professor of practical theology at Union Theological Seminary in New York City.

Mock, who served as the national director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights for 12 years until 2001, has been involved for many years in women's interfaith dialogue. She said she works with Muslim organizations when she can, although it is difficult today given the increase in anti-Israel sentiment.

She said she is commended for doing her job when she speaks in solidarity with Muslim or Canadian Arab organizations, "but when I speak out against anti-Semitism, I'm accused of being biased because I'm Jewish. There's a name for that, and it's anti-Semitism."

Moore said she realizes now that no one should be a bystander when it comes to hate.

"Anti-Semitism is a human problem. It affects all of us, and we all need to be working together to solve it."

Although her parents were liberal-minded, Moore said she felt "displaced" as a white minority high school student and suffered racially related harassment. But becoming an "active agent of hate" was a gradual process, beginning with her introduction to the neo-Nazi faction as "a group of ordinary men and women concerned about the future of Canada."

Moore's turnaround began when she was asked probing questions as part of the filming of the television documentary Hearts of Hate: The Battle for Young Minds.

"Suddenly I'm accountable to Canada for what I'm doing," she said.

She credited Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, with being a key player in helping her break away.

"How could I have avoided this pit?" she asked. "I strongly believe anti-racism education should be mandatory in our schools. It shocked me to learn that after all this time, it's still not mandatory and that teachers aren't learning how to deal with prejudice in the classroom. That's a problem that must be rectified to prevent people [from] falling into the trap I did. You've got to get them before the hate does."

Anti-bullying programs are very important, she added.

People should set an example for their children and notify police if they see hate propaganda, she said, but advised against trying to talk young neo-Nazis out of their beliefs.

"All you're going to do is antagonize them, because they're so brainwashed. What you have to do is be there for them, listen to what they have to say. If you think you can say something they'll listen to, say it. Be there for them, because you never know when they might want to do what I did, which is get out. If you've given up hope, where are they going to go?"

Boys, who includes among her students "rabbis-to-be" from the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary across the street from her own institution, said she hopes Christians "may have real relationships with deeply committed, knowledgeable Jews. I believe there is nothing more authentic that can counter hate than this, and contribute to revitalizing both our communities."

The event, which was moderated by Julia Koschitzky, chair of the Israel NOW Consortium, was a program of UJA Federation Women's Campaign and Advocacy.

Heroic rescue of Denmark's Jews recalled

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Jon Haas has no actual memory of being spirited across Denmark's narrow Oresund Strait in a small fishing boat to safety in southern Sweden. But every day, he derives its benefits.

Holocaust Education Week

He was just 10 months old in the autumn of 1943 when his parents bundled him up, along with his two brothers, and joined more than 7,000 Danish Jews who travelled the short distance to safety, right under the nose of the Gestapo.

The family spent almost two years in Sweden, where Haas's father, a German national who had been interned at Buchenwald, found work as a gardener.

They were the beneficiaries of the courage and heroism of the Danish people, who were propelled by their Christian faith and belief that Jews were their fellow Danes and neighbours, to rescue virtually the entire community.

The rescue of Danish Jewry, a haphazard but highly effective effort, has entered Holocaust history as a prime example of collective altruism and bravery in the face of extreme danger.

The rescue and its 60th anniversary formed the theme for the opening last Thursday of the annual Holocaust Education Week.

Haas, who came to Canada in 1979, told a packed hall at Temple Sinai that he's been "waiting 58 years to express sincere thanks" to Denmark. "My family's survival could not have been possible without it."

Even though 17 Jews drowned in the escape attempts and 52 ended up dying at the Theresienstadt concentration camp, everyone who fled to Sweden lived, thanks to the now-famous operation, dubbed "Little Dunkirk."

His family's time in Sweden "was a major issue when I was a kid," Haas told The CJN. "My parents always spoke about it. It was a hard time, but also a good time."

The opening program of Holocaust Education Week, however, belonged to keynote speaker and noted U.S. Holocaust scholar Michael Berenbaum, who said Danes, to this day, do not see themselves as righteous, but as decent.

"They treated their neighbours as they should be treated. They did not see in Jews 'the other,' but as neighbours, fellow Danes and fellow humans," said Berenbaum, a former director of the U.S. Holocaust Research Institute and onetime head of Stephen Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation.

Syria deals in a deadly card game

The same day that a mission of emissaries from Syrian President Bashar Assad visited the government of Lebanon early last week, Hezbollah shelled an Israeli position in the Har Dov area of the Golan Heights. Four Israeli soldiers were injured.

The visitors from Damascus were in Lebanon allegedly "laying down the law" to their "sovereign" Beiruti counterparts about possible future Syrian military movements.

The timing of the artillery barrage was no coincidence. The Syrian-Iranian-Hezbollah trinity is testing Israel.

Over the weekend, Syrian Information Minister Ahmad Al-Hassan made what can only be described as a bizarre statement in an interview with the pan-Arab newspaper Asharq Al-Awsat.

"The Syrian people, after being provoked by the Israeli attack on its territory [the IDF strike against the Islamic Jihad training camp on Oct. 5] are asking the government to retaliate," Al-Hassan told his interviewer. "It is difficult to restrain the people's reactions, especially as there are Israeli settlements in the Golan within a short distance of Syrian territory. A group of people might shell these settlements."

Though lacking all credibility, the statement was still ominous. There are no spontaneous "people's reactions" in Syria. It is one of the most tightly controlled societies in the Middle East. Any "reaction" against Israel would be directed by the government.

Apparently, Al-Hassan was merely elaborating upon an earlier statement delivered by his cabinet superior, Foreign Minister Farouk Al-Shara, regarding the Oct. 5 air strike. Al-Shara said: "Our people will not stand for another attack and we will have to carry out the will of the people. We have many cards that we have not played. Don't forget the many Israeli settlements in the Golan. I am not exaggerating but describing things as they might happen."

Farouk al-Shara is no ghost of Marley trying to change Scrooge's ways. He is, rather, a crafty, thuggish minion of his young but malevolent Ba'athist boss. He speaks about Syria's many cards. But it is not at the table of diplomacy he intends to play them. It is, as we know, on the dealer's green velvet of terror.

The West must pay heed and rein in the Syrians.

Canadian Alliance foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day offered good advice last week when he urged the government to act. "Canada should go to the United Nations and call on Hezbollah and its political leadership in Iran and Syria to halt their aggression against our Israeli allies."

With our own soldiers in the Golan Heights, Canada has an additional interest in doing so beyond merely doing the right thing and should, therefore, lead the way.

Malaysian prime minister confused

In connection with Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad's false assertion that "Jews get others to fight and die for them," it is worth reviewing recent Malaysian history.

When the Japanese invaded Malaya (now Malaysia) in World War II, there was no effective Malayan army, and the country was (unsuccessfully) defended by a large British, Australian and Indian force. It was thanks to the U.S. victory in Asia that the Japanese surrendered in Malaya.

World War II was followed by a prolonged guerilla war by Chinese communists against the British army. The army, which defeated the communists, was largely a conscript force. The percentage of its Jewish soldiers reflected the population in the United Kingdom (about two per cent).

I wonder if Mahatir is confused about who fights and dies for whom.

More on Mahatir

I do not know why anyone should be surprised by the recent comments of the Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad that the Jews "invented socialism, communism, human rights and democracy so that persecuting them would appear to be wrong, so that they can enjoy equal rights with others."

The clear implication of this statement is that there is nothing inherently wrong with persecuting Jews and that they do not deserve to be treated as equals. This view is entirely consistent with the centuries-old Islamic view of the Jews as "dhimmis," a vulnerable minority wholly dependent on the goodwill of the Muslim majority. The Jews were forced to pay an exorbitant tribute (the jizya) to protect themselves against the Muslims. They were forced to wear distinctive clothes that made them easily recognized and humiliated in public. It was forbidden for them to construct new synagogues, to restore old ones and to use religious objects. When a country needed the Jews to help improve the economy, the ruler would treat his dhimmis well; when events dictated the need for a scapegoat, the dhimmis were powerless to mount an opposition.

This is why Mahathir said, "The only problem with the Jews is when the State of Israel was created." At the dawn of the 21st century, the prime minister of Malaysia is still holding on to the medieval concept of the Jew as a dhimmi, a second-class person without a state of his own. And Mahathir is supposed to be the model of an "enlightened," "moderate" Muslim leader.

Most Muslims have given up on the idea of defeating Israel militarily. That is why they have shifted their war to the diplomatic front, trying to delegitimize Israel and turn it into the only state in the world whose existence is conditional. Whether Israel is destroyed by a jihad, or by the influx of millions of people hostile to its very existence under an absurdly broad "right of return," the goal is the same. The Arab and Muslim dream is to once again make the Jews a vulnerable minority, to teach the dhimmis their rightful place in the world.

Yes, I know that not all Muslims feel this way, but where are they? I have heard nothing but vitriolic slander from their clergy and leaders. Just listen to Mahathir. Have you heard any Muslim leader denounce him?

Terrorists are cowards

Every time I see pictures of Palestinian terrorists, they are wearing face coverings (Front page photo, CJN, Oct. 30).

If they are as brave and proud as they want the world to believe, why don't they show their faces?

They are nothing more than cowards.

Drabinsky's Gospel of John

The rationalization expressed by Garth Drabinsky and his associates/advisors for producing the film The Gospel of John are disingenuous and self-serving at best.

Taken at face value, whether completely verbatim or in part, the Gospels remain the cause of anti-Semitism. There is ample literature proving this, by both Jewish and Christian historians and theologians. For example, in the book Who Killed Jesus, author John Crossan, a Christian professor of biblical studies, writes, "The units, sequences and frames of the passion narrative were derived not from history remembered but from prophecy historicized." A verbatim reading or film rendering of the Gospels is neither educational or historically accurate. It only propagates and perpetuates a polemical reconstruction of events that became the matrix for Christian anti-Judaism and eventually for European anti-Semitism.

Media's big lie

Regarding the late Israel Asper's October 2002 speech in Montreal (" Dishonest reporting: Media bias against Israel," CJN, Oct.16), what was not emphasized was that Jews have been an essential and vital part of Palestine since biblical times. It was only in the year 637 when the Arabs invaded Palestine that they established a presence in that land.

Since 637, under a succession of ruling powers, there has been a significant Jewish presence in the Holy Land. Here are some population counts at various times in history:

- 1520 to 1884 in Jerusalem – 7,120 Jews, 5,000 Arabs, 3,390 Christians.
- 1887 in Jerusalem – 28,000 Jews, 7,560 Arabs, 3,390 Christians.
- 1905 – 45,000 Jews in Jerusalem, 12,000 Jews in Safad, 5,5000 Jews in Tiberias.

These numbers prove there has been a big lie perpetrated by the media, which have claimed the League of Nations, and later the United Nations, gave European Jews land that belonged to the Arabs. In fact, it is the Jews who own that land, and who lived consistently for generations in what was Palestine far longer and in vastly greater numbers than the Arabs.

Today, Arab claims on Israel are based on nothing but generations of false claims sustained by consistent media bias that is bolstered by militant Arab nationalism.

Rabin's legacy for the future peace

By MAYA GOLDENBERG

As we mark the eighth anniversary of the assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, who was killed by a Jewish religious extremist at the end of a massive peace rally in Tel Aviv on Nov. 4, 1995, there is a natural tendency to wonder whether things would have been different had Rabin lived. While such profound questions are best left to philosophers and prophets, we can, nevertheless, safely say that eight years after his murder, Rabin's legacy continues to influence events in Israel, as well as throughout the Middle East and beyond.

The immediate impact of Rabin's assassination on Israeli society was tremendous. The killing was the first political murder since the establishment of the State of Israel, and its affect on religious-secular relations was dramatic and negative. The delicate political and social balance between religious and secular Jews in Israel that had held since 1948 was brutally violated for the first time. There has been no subsequent reconciliation, and it may take a long time before the questions and issues raised by Rabin's killing are fully addressed. But whatever the explanations for it that may emerge in the future, a political murder is unacceptable under any circumstances in a free and democratic society.

Meanwhile, 10 years after the signing of the Oslo peace accords, Israel faces a complicated and cruel reality in its relations with the Palestinians. The latest intifadah is now into its fourth year. Hundreds of innocent Israeli civilians, including children, are being indiscriminately cut down in terrorist attacks on both sides of the "Green Line," as are soldiers in the course of their military service. The Palestinians, of course, are also paying a terrible price, due to the irresponsible, reckless political stewardship of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, who is leading his people toward disaster.

But none of this diminishes the historic significance of the changes in Israel's relationship with the Palestinians that were initiated under Rabin's watch. The exchange of recognition between Israel and the PLO (on behalf of the Palestinian people) and Oslo's Declaration of Principles set the two peoples on an irreversible process of historic reconciliation. Arafat's hateful machinations can only delay the process set in motion by Rabin, as Oslo has become a landmark by its very establishment and existence. This, in my opinion, is the most important legacy Rabin has left us. If great leadership is measured by the ability to sense profound change and exploit it, surely Rabin must be considered a great leader.

Conflicts tend to evolve on various levels or dimensions, and one of their prominent characteristics is that they tend not to unfold in a linear way. There are times when circumstances allow for moving forward toward a resolution due to the emergence of charismatic leadership or creative initiatives. However, there are also times when things move backward due to the strengthening of extreme social forces or the absence of strong, innovative leaders prepared to direct their populations toward new agendas. A case in point is the complex, though ultimately successful, process toward conflict resolution in Northern Ireland. What sets the Irish case apart from ours is the absence of a Palestinian leadership truly committed to matching the courageous barrier-breaking decisions taken by Rabin (as well as his disciple, former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak).

A related, second legacy of Rabin's leadership – one that is often ignored, given Israel's current economic difficulties – is the significant strides his government took in the early 1990s to revolutionize the Israeli economy.

Under Rabin, Israel began the difficult task of revitalizing a national infrastructure that had been allowed to fall into serious disrepair. He initiated much of the vast network of transportation, industrial and social projects that have made Israel's quality of life comparable to, or better than, those of many Western democracies. It is largely a consequence of the vital reforms introduced by the Rabin government in the early 1990s that the Israeli economy remains fundamentally stable and strong, despite its current problems.

Rabin's efforts to change the national economic agenda coincided with his understanding that the collapse of communism and the end of the Gulf War provided unprecedented economic opportunities for Israel.

One important legacy of the Rabin era was the enormous steps his government took to integrate Israel into the regional Middle Eastern economy.

On Oct. 1, 1994, the six Arab countries of the Gulf Co-operation Council announced the suspension of their boycott of firms that do business with Israel. Weeks later, the first Middle East Economic Summit opened in Casablanca, Morocco. A total of 540 Israeli businessmen and political leaders were for the first time able to interact with their counterparts from throughout the Arab world. In short order, three more regional economic summits were convened – in Jordan in November 1995, in Egypt in November 1996 and in Doha, Qatar, in November 1997. These four summits had a tremendous impact in establishing mutually profitable, normal economic relations between Israeli firms and their Arab counterparts.

Giant multinational corporations that had historically shied away from Israel due to the longstanding Arab boycott – including Holiday Inn, Pepsi, McDonald's, Volkswagen and Daimler-Benz – became major players in the Israeli economy. (It should also be noted that major companies such as IBM, Intel, General Electric, Microsoft, Motorola and General Dynamics had already been operating in Israel despite the boycott.)

Research conducted at the time by Dun and Bradstreet and Israel's Ministry of Industry and Trade found that some 400 foreign corporations were operating in Israel and Arab countries at the same time – even in Arab states that were still technically at war with Israel and abiding by the boycott. Many of these corporations continue to do business in Israel despite the diplomatic stalemate with the Palestinians and the economic slowdown globally and in Israel, yet another testament to the stable economic infrastructure constructed under Rabin.

As Rabin put it at the Jerusalem economic summit attended by 1,540 Arab and Israeli businessmen and political leaders in November 1994: "I believe that any progress in the political channel gives its results within the economy. The coming peace enables Israel to [do things it could not] in the past, such as enlarging foreign investments, opening Israel's exports to new markets as well as bringing more tourists to Israel."

The true test of leadership is the ability to not only recognize opportunities for change, but also to strategically exploit those opportunities. Rabin entered into the Oslo peace process with few illusions. As a career soldier, he had seen too much bloodshed to be a starry-eyed idealist. He also had a deep skepticism about dealing with Arafat (a skepticism that events of the past three years have justified).

But as a military man, Rabin also probably understood better than anyone else the tremendous cost of continued warfare to the State of Israel and Israeli society. Unfortunately, peacemaking does not depend solely on the will and dreams of Israelis. It also takes leadership, vision and courage on the part of Palestinians. Tragically for both Israel and the Palestinians, Arafat lacks such qualities. However, the events of the past 10 years must not detract from the legitimacy of Rabin's historic contribution to the building of Mideast peace.

The Israeli-Palestinian and Arab-Israeli conflicts, in all of their complex manifestations, will ultimately be resolved by future generations of leaders on all sides with the wisdom, courage and charisma to enable them to follow in Rabin's historic footsteps.

Ways of knowing

We are the most learned generation of Jews. That is an amazing fact. With all the tumult over trends in North American Jewish population figures, with their predictions of doom due to increased intermarriage, this detail escapes the demographic delineation. Nonetheless, while affirming Jewish continuity, that factor is not unambiguous.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

First to the historical reality. With the advent of modernity, Jewish educational standards shifted to the principle of democratic opportunity. Western regulations required public education and Jews either sent their children to the local public school or created institutions expressly for Jewish studies. The day school movement proliferated and even included female children.

No other previous Jewish community sustained and/or embraced Jewish education for all. As the "people of the Book," we certainly believed in education. Study was even considered a way of worship. Yet, it was systematically reserved for a small male elite. Particular men were deemed worthy of the expense and effort. Exceptional women were taught "Torah." But given limited resources, the majority of Jews were too busy working to entertain yeshiva learning. So our contemporary standard is revolutionary and consequential. More people of all ages are in formal learning environments studying Jewish texts today than ever before. That is surely cause for confidence and celebration.

Yet, it is also cause for concern. For while we are the most educated, we might also be the most ignorant – unaware, unfamiliar, unacquainted – basically unknowing. How can I say that? Just think about what is being taught and what our ancestors knew from their lived experience. In September, day schools teach about the holidays. Did my grandmother go to school? No. Did she know about Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, and Shabbat? Yes! She knew more than just which foods were appropriate: she knew the rituals and rhythms of the day. She could not pray in Hebrew, but she knew how to pray to God. She could not cite biblical references, but she knew the stories and accounts of our past.

Our children are deprived. They do not grow up seeing and experiencing Jewish life. The tastes and smells, the touch and feel of a Jewish life is lost for most Jews. They learn about it, but they do not practise it. We have shifted the locus of learning from house to the school. I am proud of our day schools and especially appreciative of the number of adult learning locations. But I wonder at how ignorant we remain, and at how much of the "abc's" of Jewish living remain out of reach.

Despite the prevailing fear for our continued survival, I remain confident. We are well-educated and we can do more. Individuals, families and communal leaders can pledge to create a complementary focus on a living Judaism.

A family matter

Usually the Yom Kippur sermon is about the akedah. It dwells on where we failed to do the right thing, or did the wrong one, so that we can change how we behave in the coming year.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

If people were dozing off in my shul at the start of our rabbi's sermon, they snapped to attention once he got going. His remarks were not on the drama of Abraham and Isaac's confrontation, but on the text of the Torah that is read during Minchah on Yom Kippur, which few hear, since most troop in just in time for the reading of Jonah. I include myself in that troop.

The Minchah parshah is drawn from Leviticus and concerns forbidden sexual unions. We are admonished not to follow the ways of the Canaanites and Egyptians – not to practise incest, child sacrifice or bestiality. Included in that litany appears the sentence: "Do not lie with a male as one lies with a female; it is an abhorrence."

This text was the basis of the rabbi's sermon. He opened up one of the hottest topics of our time, one of the greatest challenges to our community. How should we respond to the changing attitudes, both legal and popular, toward gay and lesbian relationships? He asked us to consider how gay and lesbian Jews can be included in klal Israel. Can they become lay leaders, rabbis, cantors, youth directors? How should rabbis respond when asked to perform commitment ceremonies of gay and lesbian couples?

"Yom Kippur is about the importance of family," he said. "One thing we must never forget is that when we are talking about gays and lesbians, we are talking about our family. We are talking about cousins, aunts or uncles, parents and children. Whatever we do as a community has a direct effect on our families. Gays and lesbians are not alien creatures living on the outside of families. They are part and parcel of our families."

The rabbi's questions were direct. Does Judaism command us to marginalize people already at risk? Will we cut off family members because of their sexual orientation? Are we offering a pallid "Don't ask, don't tell" formula? Will we say, "Sure you can join the synagogue but you can't teach a class, read Torah, or become a board member"? And, the most explosive issue, where two are in a committed relationship, can we create ceremonies that mirror heterosexual marriage rites?

We know that human sexual orientation is a fraught condition. Gays and lesbians may not choose their orientation, just as heterosexuals may not choose theirs. The rabbis were not aware of any of the scientific theories about sexual orientation, and equated homosexuality (at least male homosexuality) with pagan cultic practices. Today that equation is meaningless. Should we reject them because their unions are barren? I know of two gay couples who are raising five children between them. There are plenty of barren heterosexual Jewish couples, and we no longer require them to divorce.

"I believe strongly that a synagogue should be a place where important moral issues can be discussed without fear of retribution," the rabbi concluded. "If we feel we have to evade the issue, then we will have failed to be a kehillah kedoshah, a holy community. We become a kehillah kedoshah through prayer, ritual, study, and devotion to the performance of good deeds. But we also become a holy community by facing up to the challenges of the day and not by evading them."

It may seem simple to come to a conclusion about these matters if we don't know any gay people. But when they become flesh and blood, when they are people you care deeply about, the discussion cannot remain at an abstract, theoretical level, couched in legal terms and removed from any emotional attachments. The outcome of our considerations will deeply affect those we know and love.

We cannot leave them to struggle alone. We owe it to them, to ourselves and to the Jewish people to probe our traditions and test our compassion. The words of the sermon put before us some heavy choices. We can't evade them any longer.

This fall, our congregation will be holding study sessions on the issue. I'll write more after the sessions.

Having a ball with community service

Autumn in Winnipeg is marked by the brilliance of the changing elms, a crisp night-time chill in the air and an overwhelming sense of relief – for me anyway – that the B'nai Brith slo-pitch baseball season is finally over. In fact, the famed prairie autumnal wind, some say, is actually a collective sigh from my teammates on the "Diamonds."

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

As in the last couple of years, we did not play well. We enjoyed each other's company and were competitive in some games, but as a ball team, we made the Bad News Bears look good, and the Chicago Cubs look lucky.

History will show that we won our first game. We spent the rest of the season fondly recalling what turned out to be our only victory, while successive opponents scored bushels of runs.

But, as I've written before, playing Jewish league baseball is about more than the game. It's about camaraderie and community. And now, in Winnipeg, it's starting to become even more.

A few players have decided that as members of the B'nai Brith "Sports Lodge," we should somehow be contributing to the quality of Jewish life in the city.

The effort began modestly last fall when a handful of players visited the Kanee Centre – the north-end Winnipeg location of the Sharon Home nursing home – to help residents attend and participate in the in-house Kol Nidre service. On a couple of occasions during the year, players were called upon to help Jewish newcomers to the city move into their homes.

Once again this fall, players helped out at High Holy Day and other services. I participated in the Simchat Torah service at the Simkin Centre, the south-end location of the Sharon Home. One teammate and I joined four high school students from Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate and the leader of the program in giving about 20 residents a holiday experience. My teammate, Jeff, wheeled residents around in their wheelchairs for the hakafot, while I carried a Torah from senior to senior and invited them hold it.

Most wanted to hold the Torah in their laps for a minute or two. I stayed close by, in case it became too difficult for people to hold on. One resident, probably in her mid-80s, told me in a soft voice as I handed her the Torah that she had never held one before. The enormity if the moment didn't strike me until later.

Another woman stroked the Torah gently as if it were a small infant. Some of the residents waved flags. Others clapped while the high schoolers sang. One resident stood up at the beginning of the program and, aided by a walker, moved slowly to the centre of the circle to wave her arms to the melodies.

The feeling I had was a powerful one. I know that all community service work is a mitzvah, but I have never had the sense that I had performed a mitzvah after taking part in an organizational board meeting or a fundraising drive. Handing a Torah to an elderly person who had never held one before felt like a mitzvah. And it was my connection with my baseball league and team that brought me to the home that day.

Now, even more than before, having had such a positive experience, I believe that when Jewish organizations bring Jewish people together, they must strive to do Jewish things. This counts for community centres, clubs, camps and others. And whether it's community service, learning or some other active connection to Jewish values, I believe such action adds depth and meaning to the communal experience.

So, as one baseball season ends and another awaits, we will continue to find ways to do more in the community and we will also continue to motivate as many of our fellow players as possible to participate. That way, no matter who loses at baseball, everybody wins.

Tulchinsky's grandfather inspired her novel

It all began with strong, riveting stories she heard as a child. Karen Tulchinsky's latest novel, The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky (Raincoast Books), a rich historical saga about a Jewish family set in Toronto before and after World War II, was inspired by her grandfather, Ben Tully (Berel Tulchinsky), a natural storyteller.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Tully, who immigrated to Canada in 1928, enjoyed reminiscing about his life, and his inquisitive granddaughter lapped up his stories.

"The most memorable story was of his escape from Russia when he was 17," she said. "If he had stayed in Russia until his 18th birthday, he would have been drafted into the army for a 25-year term. As the youngest child, his family didn't want him to succumb to that fate, so they hired smugglers to take him across the Dneister River into Romania, where they hoped he would make his way to Germany and get on a boat to Canada to join his older brother, Harry Tulchinsky, who was already living in Toronto."

The story of his adventure, which Tulchinsky incorporated into her novel, did not end there. "He tried to leave Russia seven times, and seven times he was arrested and put in jail. Eventually, he was helped by a sympathetic Russian family, who hid him in the bottom of a dry well. All day, he sat on the cold concrete of the well, fending off spiders and rats. A few times he heard the Russian authorities above searching for him. At night, he slept in the barn.

"Finally, he was led to a rowboat, and along with several others, set off across the Dneister River toward Romania. About half way across, shots rang out. They were being fired upon by the Russians, who did not want them to leave, and the Romanians, who did not want them to enter."

In desperation, Tully jumped into the water and swam away, losing a ruby necklace his mother had given him to help him get started in Canada. "So instead of arriving in Canada with a sum of money, he arrived penniless." Nevertheless, Tully prospered in Toronto as a businessman.

As Tulchinsky blossomed as a writer, with such novels as Love Ruins Everything and Love and Other Ruins, she never forgot Tully's tales. In her heart of hearts, she knew they would form the nucleus of a future novel.

"Originally, I set out to write a story about a Jewish Russian immigrant family living in the Kensington Market area during the Depression and the war years," she explained.

But as she mined the memories of her parents, Jack and Marion, and of relatives like Sybil and Shelly Jackson and Judy and Norman Silver, she decided to expand the scope of The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky, excerpts of which she will read at Toronto's Jewish Book Fair on Nov. 12 at 8 p.m.

Her father, a retired businessman who owned and operated a snack food distribution company, added to her trove of information by recalling Toronto's Christie Pits riot, which erupted on Aug. 16, 1933. She describes the riot, the subject of an out-of-print historical work by historians Cyril Levitt and William Shaffir, as "a defining moment in the history of Toronto Jews."

It started when members of an anti-Semitic "swastika" club unfurled a large sheet emblazoned with a swastika – an ancient Hindu symbol expropriated by the Nazis – toward the close of a baseball game.

The brazen display of "white power" enraged Jewish fans and sparked a six-hour riot, causing many injuries, but no fatalities. The disturbance was symptomatic of the lamentable state of race relations in Canada in the 1930s. "Once I discovered the riot, I knew I had to use it as a backdrop in the book," Tulchinsky explained. "This is a piece of Canadian history that has barely been told."

More to the point, she was amazed that a race riot could have convulsed a city that, 70 years later, has evolved into one of the world's most multicultural and cosmopolitan cities.

Tulchinsky, who wrote the novel on and off over a four-year period and completed 15 drafts before submitting a manuscript for publication, also consulted her cousin, Gerald Tulchinsky, a historian of Canadian Jewry, and Harry Tepperman, who was present at Christie Pits when the riot occurred.

"[Gerald's] expertise as a historian and his knowledge of the times and the community were tremendous resources to me."

As for Tepperman, he gave Tulchinsky invaluable insights into the anti-Semitic provocations that preceded the riot and a first-person account of the actual event.

"He remembered the moment when the Swastika Club unfurled the swastika and how shocked everyone was. He said, 'You could feel the tension in the air.' He gave me a wonderful description of the sensory details going on at that moment – the shouting, the heat, the fear, the sudden appearance of hidden weapons, the bricks, stones, lead pipes, brass knuckles, baseball bats. I read anything I could get my hands on about the riot, but Tepperman's recollections were instrumental in allowing me to get a feel for it."

Tulchinsky modelled her main character, Sonny Lapinsky, a middleweight boxer of the 1940s and 1950s, after the late, legendary Canadian prize-winning pugilist Sammy Luftspring.

"I didn't actually decide to make Sonny a boxer so much as it was decided for me. It sounds a bit weird, but when you are writing fiction, sometimes the characters just take over and tell you what they want to do. In my early draft, I had no intention of making Sonny a boxer. I fought the idea because, frankly, I knew nothing whatsoever about boxing. But after a bit of time, I realized it was the only thing Sonny could do."

Having settled that matter, Tulchinsky immersed herself in the literature of the sport, reading biographies of famous champions and watching "fight" movies.

"One of the books I read several times was Sammy Luftspring's biography. Chronologically, he would have been a few years older than Sonny. But, obviously, his story was important for me to get a sense of a Jewish boxer from Toronto. I wouldn't say that Sonny Lapinsky is based on Sammy Luftspring, because my research also included many other boxers from that era. But certainly Sammy was a great inspiration, and I did want to honour Sammy's memory and achievements through Sonny."

Karen Tulchinsky

Similarly, the rest of the characters in The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky are purely fictional. "All fiction begins with real people, but then the imagination takes over and characters are invented. I had a lot of material to draw on."

Tulchinsky, who comes from an observant Jewish family active in the Conservative Judaic movement, has been writing for as long as she can remember.

"I was born writing," she said. "When I was a kid, if I was bored in school, I would write stories about my teacher. I began to take myself seriously as a writer in the early '90s, when I got my first short story published in a literary anthology."

Love and Other Ruins and its sequel, Love Ruins Everything, published in 1998 and 2002, are partially autobiographical. As she put it, "It's all true and all made up. That is to say, the characters and the emotional energy are based on my life."

Like some of the characters in her novels, Tulchinsky is a lesbian. Asked how her parents reacted to her sexual orientation, she replied, "At first, it was hard on them. It was not what they expected for me. But over the years, they have grown used to the reality of my life. As gays and lesbians gain civil rights, it becomes easier for our families to not only accept our lives, but embrace us."

Tulchinsky's short stories, published under the title of In Her Nature, dwell on such themes as family dynamics, ethnic and sexual identity, anti-Semitism and cross-cultural relationships.

Of late, she has concentrated on the novel rather than the short story.

"I think novels allow a writer to tell a longer story with more depth and scope. I have the fortune of being prolific. Once I sit down to write, the pages come tumbling out."

Tulchinsky, who moved to Vancouver in the late 1980s after falling in love with the ocean, the mountains and the slower pace of life, segued into film after Love Ruins Everything was released.

"I kept hearing it would make a great film, and wanted to explore that possibility."

A recent graduate of the Canadian Film Centre's writer's lab and professional screenwriting program, she has written scripts based on Love Ruins Everything and The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky, and hopes they will be optioned for movies.

Tulchinsky, who has also written scripts for television, is currently working on a new novel, The Shoemaker's Daughter, which is about Russian relatives who were murdered during the Holocaust. In it, she will try to imagine what might have happened to her missing relatives when the Nazis occupied their town.

If The Shoemanker's Daughter is as evocative as The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky, Tulchinsky will have taken a great leap forward as a writer.

Police chief witnesses Israeli counter-terrorism training

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Owen Sound police chief Tom Kaye visited Israel last summer, he was expecting to improve his knowledge of the country's vaunted anti-terrorism program and its efforts to interdict the drug trade.

Like other Canadians who rely on the media, he knew about the bomb attacks and the tough Israeli reaction. But he was surprised to experience first-hand the rapid Israeli response to incidents, such as a bomb-disposal crew blowing up an unattended package near his Jerusalem hotel and then opening the street within 30 minutes, or the quick repair and reopening of a café within a few days of a bloody suicide bombing.

Tom Kaye

He was also taken aback by a knife-wielding terrorist's brazen assault on a uniformed officer in broad daylight outside the Damascus Gate in Jerusalem. The attack took only seconds, but it was caught on tape, which led to the perpetrator's quick apprehension.

He was impressed at the training in religious sensitivity that police recruits receive, witnessing first hand the upbraiding of a young recruit for taking a position on the Temple Mount's walls that might have been considered provocative by Arabs.

And he was particularly shocked at the difference between media reports about Israel's counter-terrorism program and the reality he learned about from Israeli officers – that 80 per cent of terrorist attempts are stopped before they turn bloody.

"The media doesn't report what's really going on there," he said.

Kaye was in Israel along with 14 police officers from Georgia and one from Detroit on a two-week tour sponsored by GILEE, the Georgia International Law Enforcement Exchange.

Founded in 1992 by Robert Friedmann, a professor of criminal justice at Georgia State University, GILEE aims to enhance co-operation between law enforcement agencies in Georgia and Israel. It also offers educational programs in community policing to visiting Israeli officers and it brings U.S., Hungarian and now Canadian officers to Israel to learn the latest counter-terrorism and drug interdiction techniques.

Kaye, immediate past president of the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police, is the first Canadian to participate in the program, one he enthusiastically supports.

Travelling in their own chartered bus, the officers toured the length and breadth of the country, from the Golan Heights to Eilat. At each stop, they were hosted by mayors and local police commanders, who briefed them on the policing issues they face.

They also visited a border guard training camp, toured an Israeli army base and visited the offices of Israel's internal security agency.

The educational component was valuable, Kaye said, and it included discussions on how Israel attempts to stem the flow of drugs, which are used to finance terrorist attacks. Part of Israel's drug problem is related to its liberal immigration policy, which has allowed organized crime to become established, he said.

Israel, he learned, has 300,000 immigrants who are unaccounted for.

On the anti-terrorism front, Kaye was struck by the importance of intelligence in preventing attacks and by the number of people who are able to respond to an incident within seconds.

"[The Israelis] believe their entire response to terrorism is based on their intelligence-gathering network," he said.

Kaye cited an example that took place during the group's visit, when Israeli law enforcement intercepted a car loaded with explosives. The car, bound for Haifa, carried as much explosive as the van that blew up the Alfred P. Murrah building in Oklahoma City in 1995, killing 168 people.

"I was told that a lot of what [police] do does not make it to the six o'clock news because it doesn't happen," he said.

Kaye said he was impressed by the absence of "turf bulls--t," unlike the situation in Canadian policing. In Israel, he found, police and intelligence agencies share information readily, since lives hang in the balance.

Kaye said he was struck by the defiant attitude of Israelis, who refuse to be intimidated by terror attacks.

"Israelis are very patriotic people. Outside of Americans, they're the most patriotic people I've seen. They're not prepared to show fear in the face of terrorism. The civilian response is not to be cowed until it goes away."

Still, Kaye admitted to some nervousness when he was out socializing with other officers. At Mike's Place in Tel Aviv, a bar that had been hit by a suicide bomber, he found that "every time the door opens, you look at who comes in."

That sort of vigilance has become normal in Israel, but he was critical of Israel's "half-assed" response to terror. The approach frustrated him and his American colleagues, he said.

"We saw Israel's response as measured and as surgical a response as could be."

If Canadians experienced the kind of attacks aimed at Israelis, he said, "I believe there is nothing we wouldn't empower police with to put an end to it."

Alumna comes full circle in Toronto BBYO

\By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Annie Ross, the new city director of B'nai B'rith Youth Organization (BBYO), is only 25 and she has already come full circle in the international organization she first joined as a young teen.

Although her predecessor, Dena Libman – who left in February for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto (which allocates funds to BBYO) – served as a director of BBYO's Lake Ontario region, encompassing Toronto and Buffalo, the region has two city executives instead of one regional one, Ross explained recently in her sunny Bathurst Street office.

With the exception of twice-a-year conventions and Toronto's annual Beauheart Ball, to which Buffalo is invited, the two cities function independently. (Hamilton and London, which used to belong to the region, no longer have BBYO chapters, and Ottawa is now affiliated with the Eastern Canadian region.)

Ross served as interim regional director from February until July, when she became Toronto city director, serving teens aged 14 to 18 in seven chapters (three B'nai B'rith girls' chapters, three Aleph Zadik Aleph boys' chapters, and one co-ed group), and their younger counterparts in grades 7 and 8 in an introductory program called Teen Connection.

Most of the members attend public schools, but there are day school students as well, said Ross.

The co-ed chapter, based at Beth Radom Congregation, is new to Toronto as of a year ago, although there are co-ed chapters in other cities.

In addition, as part of a soon-to-begin pilot project, bar and bat mitzvah celebrants at Beth Radom will receive a free one-year membership to Teen Connection. After the initiative gets under way, organizers hope to expand it to other unaffiliated synagogues.

The aim is to enhance membership in BBYO and keep Jewish teens involved in the Jewish community, said Ken Bernknopf, chair of BBYO's board of directors.

When Ross was a young teen in 1991, she joined the now-defunct Dor Chadash chapter and "took to [BBYO] right away… I really wanted to get involved." Over her years as a member, she held positions ranging from chapter secretary to regional Jewish heritage chairwoman, organizing programs such as Onegei Shabbat at conventions.

Annie Ross

"That was one of my favourite positions," she recalled. "I was responsible for making sure heritage programming was being done in the chapters."

A graduate of York University, where she majored in religious studies, Ross was involved with Koach (the Conservative movement's university arm) while she was on campus. In third year, she became a volunteer adviser with BBYO, and the following year she joined the staff as assistant director.

What impresses her most about the organization is a certain "magic… you take out what you put in."

The majority of volunteer advisers and adult board members are alumni, she noted. "I always knew I wanted to come back in some way, to give back to the organization."

Although there are fewer members than when Ross was a teen, the programming and the excitement are the same, she said. She attributes the drop in membership to an increasing number of extra-curricular activities, including part-time jobs, that teens are involved in, as well as to the pressure to earn good marks to get into university.

"One of the things we teach is time management," she said. "My priorities are to continue to help the program grow, and to have BBYO as a driving force in the Jewish community, while teaching our teens leadership."

BBYO is a youth-led but staff-facilitated leadership development program for Jewish teens, she said. Significant components include Israel, community service, Jewish heritage, leadership and interpersonal skills, as well as the social aspect.

Programs are planned according to the interests of the participants, said Ross. They range from a recent murder mystery-themed "spirit convention" (focusing on how much spirit is displayed by each chapter) to volunteer projects to athletic programs.

Woman firefighter stumbled on career

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Sara Rosen remembers smelling smoke in the air long before her fire truck got to Woodbine Racetrack, the site of the August 2002 fire that killed 32 horses and caused more than $3 million in damages.

Sara Rosen

When her truck got there, the wood and concrete stables were ablaze and the horses, freed by their panicked trainers, were stampeding across the grounds. Some of them were on fire. Their skinny legs burned first. Then, in shock, they collapsed to the ground.

"I never imagined seeing horses on fire," whispers Rosen.

Rosen's job was to start the water from the fire hydrant, but every time she neared the hydrant, the horses charged and the chief yelled at her to get back to the truck. At one point, she and her colleagues almost put the fire out, but then the barn collapsed and sent flames rushing through the complex. When dawn broke, the fire was still raging.

That night stayed with her. Not long after, Rosen's neighbours were barbequing meat at a street party when a familiar odour reached her nostrils.

"I smelled something, I didn't know what it was, but the smell reminded me of Woodbine," she recalls.

On the grill was horse meat.

Rosen, 25, has been fighting fires in Toronto for more than two years, but that wasn't her original plan. She wanted to be a veterinarian, but changed her mind when she discovered she was allergic to cats. She stumbled into it while working as a ski instructor in Banff, where she became a volunteer firefighter to stave off the nightly boredom of the dorm rooms. After deciding university wasn't for her, the Bialik graduate enrolled in a six-month firefighting program at Humber College, where she was the only woman in the class.

Now Rosen is the only woman and the only Jewish firefighter at her new station at Keele Street and Weston Road, where she rides on a rescue truck. She has her own dressing room and shower there, something she insisted on after sharing a locker room with an all-male crew at her first fire station.

At the station, the men try to make her feel like part of the gang.

"Sometimes they're really cute," she says. "It's assumed they're all in the hockey pool, but once they came up to me and said, 'We don't want to embarrass you, but do you want to be in the hockey pool?' I was like, 'Sure, why not?' They try to make me feel welcome without intimidating me. I think it's really nice."

In her spare time, Rosen works as a hypnotherapist from her Bolton home. She is also writing a book about her brother, who suffers from a kidney disease, their family, and her upcoming wedding.

Pizzas cheer up soldiers in Israel Defence Forces

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Dan Morganstein and his children Lyndsay, 12, and Weston, nine, have taken pizza delivery to a whole new level.

While in Israel for Lyndsay's bat mitzvah this summer, the family spent time delivering pizzas to soldiers stationed in the outskirts of Jerusalem.

Morganstein, a commercial pilot, said they got involved in their "adventure" after contacting Shimon Aharon, project director of www.pizzaidf.org, an online company that delivers kosher pizzas to soldiers in the field, on jeep and foot patrols, at roadblocks, on army bases or on guard duty.

Deliveries, which are made after an online order is placed, are co-ordinated with the security forces, and if the pizzas are dedicated to a friend or family member, pizzaidf will send out a certificate of appreciation.

"When I told Shimon that we were planning to come to Israel, he said we could accompany the drivers on some deliveries," Morganstein said.

"It was a real treat. The soldiers truly appreciated the pizzas, and were touched that people had thought of them. At one busy checkpoint, one of the soldiers said, 'I love you for bringing this pizza, but we would feel bad if a terrorist got through, so let's hurry.'"

Lyndsay, a Grade 7 student at Forest Hill Public School, said it was "so cool to see the soldiers smile. I was glad to see them happy."

Weston, who is in Grade 4 at Cedarvale Public School, was "happy to see the solders at work."

Morganstein said it has always been important to him to help out wherever he can.

"My father's family were Holocaust survivors and my mother's family were Canadians, so growing up, I received two very distinct messages.

"I learned about being victims, and I learned about what Jews are capable of doing. It was a very powerful mix, and it taught me why we must always fend for ourselves."

Ordering pizzas for the soldiers, he said, "gives people the opportunity of reaching out to those who are putting their lives on the line for us. "Messages can even be sent with orders, so the soldiers really know what people are thinking."

Pizzas, which can be ordered from anywhere in the world, are sent out within our hour. "It is the only such program that is sanctioned by the IDF so we know it is safe."

Now the Morganstein family is back home, and they've continued to order pizzas for soldiers every time they order a pizza for themselves. "We make a telephone order, and then we place a Web order to Israel," Morganstein said. "It's a great tradition."

Recently, a friend who he had helped with a move bought pizza and drinks for a platoon of soldiers in the Morganstein name. Morganstein was touched. "That is one of the most thoughtful things anyone has ever done for us," he said.

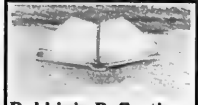
Could we follow the example of Abraham?

By RABBI AARON MITNICK



Rabbinic Reflections

Much has been written in these pages – and rightly so – of the descent of Palestinian society into a netherworld that glorifies the mass murder of Jews. Opinion poll after opinion poll has revealed that it isn't just some diabolical fringe that supports the suicide bombings, but rather that the vast majority of Palestinians do.

And that brings us to a very important question – one that should make you squirm in your seat: what if you were brought up as a Palestinian living in the West Bank or the Gaza Strip? Would you be among the majority who supports the suicide bombings? If we're honest, do we not have to concede that we, too, would be out there supporting the suicide bombers?

I told you this would make you feel uncomfortable.

Of course, each of us would like to believe that we're not simply a product of our environment. Of course, each of us would like to think that we would not be among the 75 per cent who support the suicide bombings. But is that simply wishful thinking?

Enter our forefather Abraham in this week's Torah portion, Lech Lecha. The Torah portrays Abraham as the quintessential critical thinker – a man who spent his entire life challenging the prevailing views of the society in which he lived.

Abraham lived in a world where a very important part of people's lives was the practice of idol worship. But from a young age, Abraham applied his mind to the effort of understanding the true nature of man and his world. He soon came to the realization that there must be a force that created and continues to direct the world. He recognized that idol worship was a misguided attempt to connect with that force, which we call God.

Lest you think that this is a mere academic quibble, Abraham's "heretical" views – and his drive to teach them – often put his life in danger from the masses, who felt threatened by his message. In fact, the Torah calls Abraham the first "Hebrew." The word for "Hebrew" in the original is "Ivri" (from the Hebrew word for on the other side), which connotes that Abraham stood completely apart from the society in which he lived.

This brings us back to our original question: if you grew up as a Palestinian, would you be part of the suicide bombing crowd? The answer: unless we are committed to follow in the path of Abraham, to critically examine the prevailing attitudes of our society as well as our own attitudes, we should not be overly confident.

One final note: although we rightly focus on the large percentage of Palestinians who support the suicide bombings, let us take a moment to consider the very small minority who have the moral clarity and courage to oppose the wanton violence. They, too, should inspire us to be critical thinkers, and to offer hope that, God willing, one day soon they will be joined in that moral clarity by the Palestinian leadership and the rest of their brethren.

Rabbi Mitnick is the spiritual leader of Beth Zion Congregation in Oshawa, Ont.

Two new novels evoke times past

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Coffee Trader* by David Liss, Random House, $24. 95 (US).

Three years ago, A Conspiracy of Paper, David Liss's first novel, a masterful recreation of many aspects of 18th-century London, with an emphasis on stock market manipulations and multiple murder, was lauded as creative and original.

The Coffee Trader, which once again blends financial intrigue with a compelling mystery, should also find a widespread readership.

Miguel Lienzo, a young Portuguese Jew who has escaped the clutches of the Inquisition, has found a safe haven in mid-17th century Amsterdam, a city surprisingly tolerant of foreigners. Eager to take advantage of the opportunities for financial speculation, he forms a partnership with a gentile Dutch widow to import coffee – a new, exotic and irresistible beverage. She supplies the capital, he the business acumen. In the hectic commodities exchange, he becomes a broker of futures.

But the protagonist's business ventures are viewed with suspicion by the Ma'amad, Amsterdam's powerful, wealthy Jewish governing body, which has the power to excommunicate. In addition, he has to ward off a bevy of enemies. They include a wily moneylender, a vindictive trader who blames Miguel for his losses on the stock market and the father of a young woman he had spurned.

In the end, Miguel cleverly outwits his would-be betrayers and rivals and escapes the wrath of the Ma'amad. He emerges as a vivid and memorable character.

Savouring coffee, delicious and stimulating, alters Miguel's personality. Under its influence, he's sharper, more intense. "The doubt that had been plaguing him, the sluggishness, the murky thinking, were all gone now. He had used coffee to banish them the way a great rabbi uses the Torah to banish demons."

Liss has carefully researched a many-sided Amsterdam and the details and background are authentic and colourful.

This second novel by a talented writer, compelling and suspenseful, assures an entertaining and rewarding read.

Great Neck* by Jay Cantor, Knopf, $41.95.

This highly ambitious novel of over 700 pages attempts to summarize the '60s and '70s in the United States and to capture the mood and spirit of the time. It traces the intertwined lives of a half-dozen pampered, intelligent and concerned Jewish teenagers in Great Neck, a wealthy Long Island community over a period of two decades – from their political awakening over the civil rights movement, to a conviction of one of them on a murder-robbery charge.

The people in this small group feel somehow "chosen" to bring justice and restore harmony to their broken society. The range of the book's subject matter is enormous: the Holocaust, the rise of black power, the anti-war movement, Jewish identity, first love, the art scene in New York—and many other themes.

The cast of characters is large and unwieldy with frequent asides and meanderings. It turns on the murder of a young civil rights worker in Mississippi that famously mirrors the slaying of three Jewish civil rights activists in the same state in 1964.

It all ends in frustration and disillusionment as most of the one-time rebels eventually drift into conventional forms of middle class behaviour.

Great Neck is not always reader friendly. It is far too long and includes numerous subplots and rapidly shifting points of view. However, for readers with time and patience, this giant, sprawling panoramic portrayal of one of the most intense eras in recent history is hesitatingly recommended.

A prayer for peace among Jews

By ROCHELLE SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

As I sat in shul this past erev Rosh Hashanah, I listened with interest and enthusiasm to our rabbi's warm and moving speech about the importance of welcoming new members into our community.

I was pleasantly surprised by the example the rabbi gave to inspire us. He encouraged us, as a Reform congregation, to take a page out of the Aish Hatorah handbook and follow its model on how to make new members feel welcome. He complimented Aish Hatorah on its warmth and talent for embracing new members, not only into its congregation, but into members' homes as well.

As I listened to the rabbi's speech with admiration, I was impressed by the way he had reached across the spectrum of Judaism not only to compliment Aish Hatorah, but to embrace a fundamental and beautiful part of Jewish philosophy. How refreshing, I thought, to hear a rabbi speak about closing the gap between different sects of Judaism by acknowledging our similarities instead of emphasizing our differences.

However, as the memory of Yom Tov slowly faded in the days and weeks to follow, the good feelings I had enjoyed that night at shul turned into loss and disappointment. As I spoke about my family's holiday experience to friends and acquaintances, one person who is a member of a Conservative shul, turned to me with disdain and said, "You blew the shofar at shul on Shabbat?" An Aish Hatorah follower who prided himself on walking to shul on Yom Tov, turned to the Conservative congregant and in a chastising tone said, "How could you drive to shul on Rosh Hashanah?" And a haredi acquaintance commented with disbelief to the Aish Hatorah young man, "I hear you allow men and women to sit together during lectures at your synagogue. How can you call yourself an Orthodox shul?"

I wept at the realization that sometimes we Jews are our own worst enemies. Instead of embracing and complimenting the unique aspects of each other's streams of our religion, we have become critical and cynical and unaccepting of one another. Shame on all of us!

I hope and pray that all sects of Judaism open their hearts and their minds to the positive attributes each of us as Jews have to offer. After all, we are all Jewish, whether we are Orthodox, Conservative or Reform. Although we may seem different from one another on the outside, we all share a common and unique bond on the inside… a Jewish soul.

My father, who grew up in an Orthodox home, is the wisest man I know. He gave a beautiful analogy the day of my son's bar mitzvah last year. As we were walking into the synagogue's sanctuary, my brother-in-law turned to my father and said, "Zaida, can you believe that they're going to play musical instruments in shul on Shabbat?"

My father thought long and hard before he answered. He then replied with tolerance and kindness.

"You know, son, I believe King David played music and praised God in song as he prayed in the Beit Hamigdash thousands of years ago, so why not here and now in this House of Prayer? After all, no matter where we go to shul or in what manner we choose to pray, our voices all rise and are heard by the same God in heaven – the God of all Jewish people."

As I look back on my experiences this past Yom Tov, I believe I finally know when the Mashiach will come. The Mashiach will arrive when all sects of Judaism respect and acknowledge each other's wonderful strengths and similarities and admire and embrace each other's vast and beautiful differences.

A tour of the best libraries

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Shhh! Can't you see you're in a library?

It's Jewish Book Month and you're invited to enter some of the most wonderful Jewish libraries in the world. From Princeton to Jerusalem, many Jewish libraries offer online highlights of their permanent collections, usually free of charge. Today, we'll tour some of the best libraries and find out how to visit dozens more.

The Jewish Highway

The Jewish National & University Library at Jerusalem's Hebrew University has a bilingual site that is home to several special collections. You can examine more than 250 ancient maps of Jerusalem from 1486 to the early 20th century. At the Songs We Love to Hear Web site, you can listen to recordings of Hebrew songs produced before the creation of the State of Israel. And Albert Einstein Online contains more than 900 digitized manuscripts from the Hebrew University's Albert Einstein Archives, including scans of his scientific materials, writings and travel diaries [http://jnul.huji.ac.il/].

In 1896, sisters Agnes Lewis and Margaret Gibson purchased fragments of a Jewish manuscript while on a visit to the Middle East. Upon their return to England, they showed their finds to the University of Cambridge's Solomon Schechter. Schechter travelled to Cairo and secured permission to bring contents of the Cairo Genizah (depository for worn-out copies of sacred Jewish writings) to England. There are now 140,000 fragments of documents from the Genizah found at the Cambridge Library's Taylor-Schechter Genizah Research Unit. Its Web site has a detailed history of the collection along with dozens of scanned images, including the handwriting and signature of Maimonides [http://www.lib.cam.ac.uk/Taylor-Schechter/Collection.html].

Yale University has held several impressive exhibits from its Judaica collection. You can enjoy scaled-down versions of five exhibits, including "You Shall Tell Your Children," an examination of the evolution of the Passover Haggadah from the 13th century to the present and highlights of Yale archeological digs in the Holy Land since the 19th century [http://www.library.yale.edu/judaica/exhibits.html].

Since Aaron Lansky founded the National Yiddish Book Center in 1980, it has recovered 1.5 million volumes. Even if you can't visit its home in Amherst, Mass., you can still benefit from its success. You can view the Yiddish Book Catalog online, check out the list "The 100 Greatest Works of Modern Jewish Literature" [http://www.bikher.org/story.php?n=10026] and read selections from Pakn Treger, an English language journal about Yiddish culture. There are features about Abraham Asen's 1947 Yiddish translation of King Lear, an essay about Yiddish life in Boro Park, a look at "Jewish" photography and a story by Sholem Aleichem presented in its original Yiddish alongside an English translation by Hillel Halkin [http://www.yiddishbookcenter.org/].

The National Library of Canada houses the Jacob M. Lowy Collection of old and rare Hebraica and Judaica, which dates from the 15th to the 20th century. You can view dozens of images online including excerpts from first editions of the works of Josephus Flavius, 17th century astronomical and mathematical drawings of Joseph Solomon Delmedigo, a pupil of Galileo, and a plate from a 1740 Venetian Haggadah with Judeo-Italian translation [http://www.nlc-bnc.ca/incunab/index-e.html].

Chicago's Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies offers an impressive online resource – at a price. Members of the Institute can access the Feinberg E-Collection that contains the full-text of nearly 800 books and 25,000 articles. Read a translation of Sefer Ha-Aggadah by Hayim Nahman Bialik, the contents of the Bar Ilan Responsa database and the entire 16-volumes of the Encyclopedia Judaica [http://www.spertus.edu/asher/feinberg/].

Unlike most of the libraries mentioned above, the Jewish Virtual Library exists only in cyberspace. The library boasts 8,000 articles and 4,000 photographs and is divided into 13 "wings." Don't miss this site's reference section, where you can find works by Ahad Ha'am and the complete text of Theodore Herzl's The Jewish State. The peace section includes documents such as the Balfour Declaration, United Nations Security Council Resolution 242 and the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement ("Oslo 2") [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/].

Happy browsing!

Hope for Tomorrow symposium

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

On December 4, community leaders will be joining together for an event that could pay huge dividends to members of our community who are most at risk.

The UJA Federation's Hope for Tomorrow symposium will involve at least 65 members of the community in finding innovative answers to better the lives of Toronto's vulnerable.

According to recent statistics, approximately 20,000 Jews in the Greater Toronto Area live at or below the poverty line. An estimated 3,000 are 14 years of age or younger, while almost 6,000 are at least 65.

"I have experienced – first hand – the way in which vulnerable members of our Jewish community are struggling day by day, whether it's paying the rent, putting food on the table, and generally providing for their children," says symposium Chair, Gordie Wolfe, who recently retired after 22 years as executive director of Jewish Family and Child Service.

Participants at the symposium, who will not be solicited for funds, will be asked to use their unique skills and experience to help find long-term solutions for Toronto's vulnerable.

"We know that we cannot eradicate poverty within the Jewish community," says Wolfe. "But, we can create new strategies to improve the daily quality of life for Toronto's Jewish vulnerable."

Among the UJA Federation partner agencies that will be participating in the symposium are Jewish Family and Child Service, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Toronto, Jewish Vocational Service, Kehilla Residential Centres and Reena.

A follow-up session is scheduled for December 15.

Comfort for Jewish troops during Second World War

By ELLEN SCHEINBERG

UJA Federation's Ontario Jewish Archives has many records documenting the important role played by Jewish troops during The Second World War, but perhaps the most interesting and moving documents are thank-you letters that were sent to the Canadian Jewish Congress War Efforts Committee by individual Jewish soldiers who received their special care packages.

During the Second World War, more than 16,000 Jewish men and women joined the Canadian Armed Forces. Many enlisted early on and were eager to defend Europe against the Nazis. Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) played a pivotal role in helping to enlist Jewish soldiers and provide support for them after they joined the military.

By tapping into a virtual "army" of individual donors and organizations, CJC was able to bring together huge amounts of donated items to send to the troops. In addition to providing the soldiers with food for the holidays, CJC also sent care packages, which contained much sought-after items, such as socks, jams, salamis, magazines and cigarettes. Some of the donors included other items that they felt might come in handy, such as chicken schmaltz. After spending several years overseas, these gifts were an important taste of home.

In a letter written by Sgt. L. Silver on October 2, 1945, he eloquently expressed this sentiment, stating "your parcels at this moment help to bring the lights of home a little nearer, and thoughts which cannot be any dearer."

Louis Wagner (above) wrote a thank-you letter to Canadian Jewish Congress on October 8, 1945.

Another Jewish soldier serving in Belfast, Samuel Walerstein, illustrated the importance of these gestures during the war, stating, "A parcel sent to a soldier, sailor, or airman makes his life feel a million times happier," he said.

Some men who wrote also indicated that these packages made them feel as if they were not forgotten and not completely isolated.

Some soldiers said that they had given their gifts to needy civilians in Holland after the North American armies had liberated them. Another soldier recommended that these packages be sent to those still left in the concentration camps after they too were liberated.

Jewish history on the beach

By WENDY LAMPERT

One of Jewish Toronto's most distinguishing features is the number of historic synagogues that continue to thrive throughout the city.

When you think of Toronto's Beaches neighbourhood, what normally comes to mind are hot summer days, walking among the shops on Queen Street East or roller-blading along the boardwalk – not Judaism and synagogues.

But tucked away just off the main strip on a tree-lined street, the Beach Hebrew Institute, often called the Beaches Shul, is alive and well and bringing Judaism to the neighbourhood.

In 1920, the First Baptist Church in Toronto's Eastern Beaches community decided to relocate, and the building, which was converted to the Orthodox Beach Hebrew Institute synagogue, moved from Queen Street East to its current location on Kenilworth Avenue. Some 40 families, mainly local merchants, joined the congregation.

The synagogue was actually born in an era that wasn't particularly hospitable to Jews. "When the shul was established, the Canadian German Party was down the road, and you could see swastikas in the neighbourhood," says Arie Nerman, President of the Beach Hebrew Institute and a member of the shul for more than 30 years. In fact, the word "synagogue" was deliberately left out of the shul's name, he notes.

Over the synagogue's 83-year history, the size of the congregation has waxed and waned with the movement of the Jewish community. But in the early 1970s, a dedicated group of members felt it was time to revive the shul. "There was a commitment to bring this shul back and create a new Jewish community in the Beaches," Nerman says.

The group started a restoration fund, and contacted Jews across the city to make their pitch. "That really got things rolling," notes Nerman, as community members once again discovered Jewish life at the beach. Today, the shul's membership counts 150 households from across the city, with some members coming from as far north as Thornhill to attend services. There's even a membership waiting list.

The small synagogue, now considered "liberal Conservative," which can accommodate as many as 250 people on High Holidays, offers regular Shabbat services, a Sunday school and many other programs, including a weekly hot lunch service for the needy in the neighbourhood.

The Beach Hebrew Institute has no rabbi – members lead prayers, and perhaps one of its most distinguishing features is its "open door" policy. "This is a people's shul," says Nerman, who notes that no tickets are needed for High Holidays, although members get first rights to seats. Even more appealing is its openness and warmth.

"The shul has a warm, comfortable feeling," says Sandy Winch, who moved from Thornhill to the Beaches with her husband Melvin about five years ago.

"We came from a big shul up north, where nobody knows anybody else. Down here, most people know each other," Winch says. "The synagogue has made us glad we chose to move to the neighbourhood. It has made it much nicer for us," she notes.

"The thing I'm most proud of is the fact that we've been able to maintain the welcoming, open door policy here," says Nerman. "People feel the shul has a warmth and an aura of hospitality that many people are looking for today. This is a small-town shul in a big city."

Arie Nerman, President of the Beach Hebrew Institute, maintains an open door policy.

B'Yachad mission readies for take-off

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

UJA Federation's largest solidarity mission to Israel in seven years is ready to roll.

The B'Yachad Mission - chaired by Stephen Goldhar, Michael Buckstein and Barry Zagdansky – includes 275 Torontonians who will leave Toronto for an unforgettable week. They will be joined by another 235 Jewish Canadians from coast to coast

B'Yachad was planned to coincide with the General Assembly (GA) which takes place in Jerusalem this year. The GA, which runs from November 16 –19, is the world's largest gathering of Jewish leaders. Of the 3,500 participants at this year's GA, 500, or nearly 15%, will be from Toronto.

After their arrival, participants will attend Canada Salutes Israel, an historic gathering of Canadians and 1500 IDF pilots, in the presence of Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, at an IDF Air Force Base.

In fact, Toronto's support is so appreciated by Israel – it is the only city out of 50 represented at the GA - that is being granted this unique opportunity.

"Prime Minister Sharon, and the entire government of Israel are looking forward to B'Yachad," says UJA Federation's Israel Emissary, Yossi Tanuri. "There is a strong sense of excitement and anticipation from Israelis about what they see as an extremely important show of solidarity."

For Toronto's Ruth Ladovsky, a veteran of many UJA solidarity missions, B'Yachad holds the promise of even more.

"I'm always looking forward to going to Israel," says Ladovsky. "But this year, by going on B'Yachad, and having different tracks to choose from at the GA, we will undoubtedly get to hear from some of the brightest minds in the world. Any time we go on a UJA mission, doors that normally wouldn't be open for us, suddenly open wide and we have access to so much more. I'm very excited about this trip."

The upcoming B'Yachad mission will give Torontonians the opportunity to meet Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

As for the special evening planned at Palmachim, Barbara Bank thinks it's an especially important opportunity.

"I think Canada – and Toronto – have always had a strong bond with Israel and her people," says Bank. "To be part of Canada Salutes Israel is not only an honour and what will no doubt be a special memory, it's more than that. This is the chance for Torontonians to express our gratitude and love for these soldiers who battle every day for our freedom, as well as for all Israelis."

"I'm going with my wife Janice, and we can't wait," says B'Yachad participant Abe Glowinsky. "To be part of such massive Toronto support for Israel is an honour. In 1996, I was on UJA's largest mission ever – Jerusalem 3000 – and being on B'Yachad – the largest since then – is sure to give me a whole new set of incredible memories."

Other highlights of B'Yachad include a visit to Jerusalem's Shaarei Tzedec Medical Centre, the GA's closing plenary with former Israeli PM Benjamin Netanyahu, dinner with Shimon Peres, and opportunities to volunteer around Jerusalem.

A healthy society requires equity

By MICHAEL DIAMOND

Congratulations Mr. McGuinty.. You ran an excellent campaign, correctly assessed the mood for change and showed how quickly you and your associates could learn from the lessons of the previous election. But winning elections and governing are two different tasks, requiring different skills. You have won well, but will you govern well?

In my estimation, you won because the Ontario electorate wanted to see a change in the nature of government; they wanted to see a government that would govern in a more socially conscious manner. I think that the "have nots" of the province were tired of losing ground, and the "haves" were tired of seeing the impact of the Common Sense Revolution on their less well-off neighbours. Perhaps the electorate had begun to understand that tikkun olam, the Jewish obligation to repair the world, can and should apply in Ontario.

As Jews, we look forward to your promised focus on the weak and the young. A society must be judged by the way it treats its weakest members. Jews have always fared best in healthy societies, and we would encourage you to follow your heart, to turn your focus to those in our society whose weaknesses make us all a little weaker. This is particularly so in the City of Toronto, where almost a decade of neglect and forced implementation of centralization policies has left us with larger bureaucracies and an essentially bankrupt municipal government with no taxing authority and enormous burdens in dealing with a changing, multi-cultural society. Ontario will not thrive unless Toronto thrives, and Toronto's momentum today is decidedly negative.

Michael Diamond

But Premier McGuinty, a healthy society also requires equity towards all of its component parts, particularly its minorities. We have an educational funding system which is so inequitable as to be bizarre. It is a throwback to a time when minorities were few in number, with even less influence than they have today; a time before the word 'multi-culturalism' was used to describe our Canadian society. Two school systems were funded - Protestant and Catholic. Everyone was free to choose between one or the other if they wished a tax paid education. Over time, the Protestant system became less Christian and more secular in nature, but two distinct systems remained. Today, if you are Catholic and feel the need to have your son or daughter educated in a Catholic setting, you can do so. If you are a mainstream Protestant, the so-called public system is available, again without additional charge. But if you are Jewish, Hindu or Muslim, you have only two choices - pay for your education, or accept the educational system of the majority.

Your predecessors reacted to this inequity by creating the EETC (Equity in Education Tax Credit). While the EETC is flawed in some respects - it does address some of the inequity in the system as it was designed to do. You have made it clear you will repeal the EETC and you have indicated you would not replace it quickly, if at all. Mr. Premier - that is fundamentally wrong and inequitable. I don't have to make the case here - it is patently obvious. Replace the EETC if you believe it to be flawed, but do not just eliminate it and return to the status quo. And please do not blame the inadequate levels of public school funding, particularly in the cities, on the EETC. That may be an effective political tool, but it is not the truth. It is a fact that for every student who is at an independent school, the Ontario taxpayer saves at least $7,000, taking into account only the annual operational cost. If I feel compelled by my religious beliefs to send my child to an independent, faith-based institution, I can do so without charge if I am a Catholic, but I must pay the full cost in addition to my full taxes if I belong to another faith.

Premier McGuinty, we are hopeful that your attention to social conscience will lead our province in the right direction, in the direct of tikkun olam, of attending to the weakest in our society, of strengthening the public school system and of dealing with perhaps one of the Western world's most inequitable distribution of public education funding. We support you in your quest and look forward to further enlightenment regarding your considered approaches and policies.

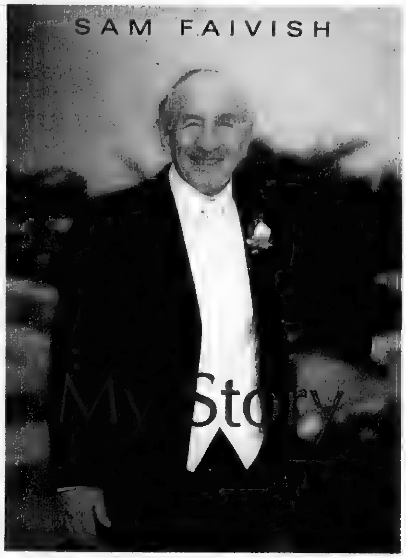
Survivor's autobiography proves labour of love

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter



Sam Faivish says he never appreciated what went into writing a book until he wrote his own 250-page autobiography.

"I'm computer illiterate," says Faivish, whose self-published book, My Story, was recently released. "I wrote by hand for four or five hours a day for three years, but it was a labour of love."

Faivish, 86, who was born in Belchatow, Poland, says that although he is a Holocaust survivor, his book, which is dedicated to his family and his wife's family who were killed in the Holocaust and to his daughter Yona who died several years ago, is not a Holocaust book.

"The Holocaust seeps in because I lived through that period, but this is the story of my life, my whole life. I wrote so my children and grandchildren will get to know me – who I am, where I came from, and what I stand for."

Faivish says he has been driven by his values his entire life, from his childhood in Belchatow and hiding out with the Barczak family during the war to his marriage to Lolka Amsel and the raising of their two children in Toronto.

"Work hard, have compassion and be charitable and kind," he says. "I stuck to those values [during the war] despite the anti-Semitism that surrounded us, and I stick to them today.

"To this day, I see a person standing before me. I don't see a Jew, a non-Jew or an Arab. I believe there is [at least] a flicker of humanity in everyone you meet, and I cherish that flicker."

It was the Barczak family, he says, who drove home his conviction that people are generally good.

"I lost touch with them for many years, but when my son Jerry was a teenager, he went to Poland and contacted them. We now correspond, and I send them cheques regularly.

"I had told them if I survived the war, I would leave them all I had, and I did transfer my property in Poland to them. If someone does something for me, I never forget."

It is essential, he says, for young people to learn about the Holocaust, so "they will understand how people kept going and never lost hope.

"I want them to see that even today, after 9/11 and with all the anti-Semitism in the world, that one person can make a difference if they take the proper steps," Faivish says.

All proceeds from the sales of My Story are going to women and orphan victims of terror in Israel.

‘An extraordinary test of Danish virtue’

Nazi Germany invaded Denmark in the spring of 1940, but they had no stated intention of encroaching on the country’s territorial integrity or political independence. However, Germany viewed Danes as fellow Aryans, and demanded they do something about their “Jewish problem.”

“Denmark responded by saying it had no Jewish problem,” Berenbaum said. But contrary to popular belief, the country’s king, Christian X, never donned a yellow Star of David in solidarity with Jews, as Danish Jews were not required to wear the degrading badge.

But Adolf Hitler changed his policy on Denmark and intended to incorporate it into the Nazi Reich. In August 1943, Germany suspended the Danish government and imposed martial law. The deportation of Jews to death camps was set to begin Oct. 1, 1943 – the first night of Rosh Hashanah.

The plan was leaked to the Jewish community by a German shipping attaché. A few days before the deportations were to start, the rabbi and cantor in Copenhagen’s main synagogue announced there would be no services for the next few weeks, as both clergymen needed vacations and were heading to the seacoast.

To the Jews, said Berenbaum, it was a none-too cryptic message to get to the coast. “The Jews instinctively fled to the sea, and the Danes instinctively helped” with transport and lodging.

For the next three weeks, some 7,200 Jews, Jewish refugees from other countries and offspring of mixed marriages were ferried to Sweden, just 14 kilometres away, in fishing boats, rowboats and pleasure craft.

Fishermen charged a fee for the trip to cover their risk, but it was a small price to pay. Most other material costs were borne largely by Danes themselves.

And the national nature of the effort was seen in the fact that not only did the Danish coast guard stand down, but most of the Nazi boats in the country suddenly found themselves in dry-dock for repairs to their hulls.

Yet, not all Jews managed to escape. Berenbaum said 464 Danish Jews were shipped to Theresienstadt, but the concern of the Danish Red Cross was so strong that none were sent to Auschwitz.

The Germans were likely aware of the rescue, Berenbaum said, but ignored it because they feared Danish resolve would stall the war effort.

Jews returning after the war even found that their neighbours had maintained their houses and kept their jobs.

The rescue “was not perfect,” he said. “But that doesn’t mean it wasn’t good. Compared to [the experience of other Jews], we can’t imagine how good it was.”

In the end, Berenbaum sees the heroic effort “as an extraordinary test of Danish virtue, and an indictment of other countries.”

Photo exhibit will be on display at Temple Sinai

A photo exhibit telling the story of the rescue of Denmark’s Jews, prepared by the country’s Museum of Resistance, will be on display at Temple Sinai (210 Wilson Ave.) for the duration of Holocaust Education Week.

Eisner brings horrors of past alive for students

By NATALIE RUSKIN
Special to The CJN

You are trapped in a room. All of a sudden, somebody walks in and attacks you with a stick. What do you do? You're three floors up. The windows are closed. Do you break one? Do you hide under the table? They'll find you. Do you go toward the person who has either a knife or stick, and fight?

Sally Eisner is talking to a class of 20 Grade 8 students who have asked how Jews let themselves be led like sheep to the oven.

"Nobody has an answer," she says. "Everybody puts their heads down. That is the end of that."

Eisner is a Holocaust survivor who speaks on behalf of the Holocaust remembrance committee of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. She visits schools and describes snapshots of her wartime experiences.

"Torture… you can't put it on paper, you can't say it in order," she says.

Each time she speaks to another group of students, it is an exercise in mental exhaustion. Many survivors repress the horrors, but Eisner believes her voice must be heard, now more than ever.

"Are we finished with it?" Eisner says of the recent global increase in anti-Semitic attitudes and incidents. "Where are we? The gravestones are being cracked… a man from a Yeshiva was killed in the middle of the night. Why? He was a Jew."

She shakes her head and sighs.

The walls of Eisner's Downsview bungalow are covered with framed portraits of her children and grandchildren. Dozens of New Year cards stand in perfect rows on her table. Three vases of flowers sit on the coffee table. The daisies are wilted, the water cloudy.

But something special happens as Eisner waltzes around her living room, reciting tales of her children's accomplishments: her face glows and you just know this 80-something bubbie once stole many hearts.

Eisner's first language is Yiddish, but she speaks English smoothly. She was born Sarah Barath in Zaleszky, Poland, which bordered on Romania.

"It was a beautiful city," Eisner says. "Americans used to go there for holidays."

When the Nazis invaded her town, Eisner's family was thrown out of their home and sent to a ghetto in Tluste, located in Poland. She was a slave in a labour camp with her parents and brother, working in the fields from sunrise to sundown with little nourishment.

The saddest day of Eisner's life was in July 1943, on the day she lost her parents. She remembers hearing the heavy pounding from the shelling.

Sally Eisner

"I thought the world was coming to an end," she says.

The Nazis commanded everyone, including her parents, to dig a mass grave. Her parents were ordered to strip and stand in line with others. Then they were shot.

"I went back to the camp the very next day and saw the grave and the blood, in pools, all over."

That day, Eisner became an orphan caught in the middle of a nightmare.

"I nearly died," she says.

Eisner is good at telling this story. She's recited it many times in different venues to many different people. Her voice carries on like a well-oiled engine: systematic, monotone, without a break. But in her eyes is a bitter, stinging pain.

"I spill my guts out… I cry when I come home."

Guilt shakes in her voice when she speaks of her parents' death: "I knew I wouldn't have them to give them even a drop of water," she says.

Eisner copes with her losses by giving back, telling children stories that she believes must be told. Speaking about pain heals her.

When Eisner began visiting schools, she thought, "Am I making sense? Was this me? Did I live through that? Am I a normal person?"

Today, she receives loads of thank-you letters from across the province, and says she is in control and feels good.

One Kitchener student writes, "You are very brave to do all these workshops… I admire you for this."

Another writes, "I promise to listen to my parents, teachers and God."

So Eisner pushes on: hands sweaty, knees shaking, with 20 confused faces staring up at her, unable to conceive of the horrors that she is about to tell.

Drabinsky's Gospel

By PAUL SHAVIV

Some weeks ago, I had the opportunity to attend a pre-release viewing of Garth Drabinsky's Gospel of St. John at the invitation of B'nai B'rith Canada. I believe The CJN's reviewer and commentator ("Bible film renders Gospel of John verbatim," "Gospel of John stands to revive deicide charge," CJN, Oct. 23) were extremely restrained in their comments.

Guest Voice

There are a number of issues. Let me say at the outset that I do not believe it is in our community's interests to create a cause célèbre over this film. Such a protest is bound to be misunderstood, because the script is a word-for-word replication of a central book of the Christian Bible. It would be impossible to criticize the film and not be perceived as offending Christian belief. But we may take a more nuanced view, and separate the text of the script from the visual dimension of the film – something entirely at the discretion and judgment of the filmmakers.

At the screening I attended, two Jewish experts from the film's academic advisory committee – Prof. Alan Segal of Barnard College and Prof. Adele Reinharz of Sir Wilfred Laurier University – were present. Both admitted this was the first time they had actually seen the film. Therefore, Drabinsky's claim that it has the endorsement of his board, including its Jewish members, seems to apply only to the script, and not to the visual treatment. That distinction is crucial to the Jewish discomfort (or more) that this film is bound to arouse.

It is true that all the characters are Jewish (with the exception of the portrayal of a small group of Greeks). But I doubt the majority of viewers will ever realize this. The film clearly delineates "good guys" (followers of Jesus) and "bad guys" (Jewish authorities, especially the Pharisees). There is a clear and constant visual distinction between the "Jewish Jews" (bad guys – dark, sinister, evil) and "non-Jewish Jews" (good guys – light, pure, innocent). The visual characterization is stark to the point of being crude.

The depiction of the Pharisees is outrageous. They are portrayed as black-clothed, sinister and brutal. At the screening, the academic advisers were unable to give any textual basis or authority for this depiction. Representatives of the production company promised to send me the costume-designer's proposal for the Pharisees' clothing. (Several weeks later, I received an e-mail with a long bibliography, which did not answer my question at all.) Perhaps the director, Philip Saville, who said on Michael Coren Live Sept. 10 that "black uniform was typical of many tyrannical powers, including the SS," let slip a more direct insight into the filmmakers' apparent intention to show the Pharisees as demonic.

Other criticism could be directed at the portrayal of the Temple Guards, and of the Kohanim. By contrast, Pontius Pilate, a ruthless murderer who condemned thousands to cruel death, is shown as a deeply sensitive, anguished moral authority pushed against his will to execute Jesus at the demands of the Jews.

Before defenders of the film rush to say as a Jew I have never read the Gospels and therefore never understood that the Gospels are profoundly anti-Jewish (a response I've already heard), I would like to point out that I have had the privilege of studying at Oxford University with Prof. Geza Vermes, one of the world's leading New Testament scholars, and probably the world's leading expert on Jesus. I have also been personally and professionally involved in interfaith dialogue for almost four decades.

The smooth-talking suggestion that the film will "contribute to community relations" or "education" is absurd and an affront to common sense. It is asinine and misleading of Drabinsky to pretend that it will. It is a powerful, even beautiful, portrayal of the Gospel, but it includes – very emotively – every aspect of the Gospel that has generated anti-Semitism over centuries. The historical context will be lost on the average Christian viewers, who will simply see the "demonic" Jews seeking the death of their Lord. The overwhelming majority of the Jews in the audience at the screening came away stunned that this film was to be distributed theatrically, and even more stunned that Jews were responsible for producing it.

Had it been produced by Christians, we may not have liked it, but at least we could have understood it. After all, it reflects the traditional Christian view of the Jews of Jesus' era, as portrayed in the Gospels. However, I cannot imagine how any responsible Jew can be associated with this film – in an artistic, academic or any other capacity. Jewish initiative in this production is, in my view, a disgrace, and doubly dangerous and irresponsible at a time when anti-Semitism in its crudest and darkest form is resurgent around the globe.

It is impossible, irresponsible and disingenuous to ignore the fact of popular anti-Semitism and its horrific history – and where that anti-Semitism has its roots. Put another way, the crowds who come out of churches or cinemas after seeing this film will not show up in Segal's or Reinharz's seminar rooms for an academic discussion on the text of the Gospel, nor in Drabinsky's offices and board meetings. I would not like to be an identifiable Jew in the vicinity of these audiences.

Pro-Palestinian professor visits Toronto universities

They were also upset that their student levy fees went toward what would have been a "one-sided event," said Denes Rothschild, chair of Hillel's Israel affairs committee at U of T.

In his talk, Finkelstein said "the only obstacle to peace is the obstinacy of the United States and Israel foiling the aspirations of the international community," and he drew comparisons between Zionism and the European conquest of North America.

Olesker, a British-born oleh, pointed out that Israel is the only country in the area that is a democracy. "Snigger if you will," he told Finkelstein's supporters, who made up about two thirds of the audience, "but Israel is the only country where an Arab could run for election on the platform of running against his government… and not face the prospect of being shot for doing so."

An entire generation of Palestinians have had their minds poisoned, Olesker said. Children are "being educated to blow up and not to grow up."

He also recalled a discussion with a Soweto school principal during the period of South African apartheid. The principal, said Olesker, thought the situations in South Africa and the Middle East were "identical… He said peace will only come to South Africa when the whites recognize that blacks are their equals and have equal rights, and peace will only come to the Middle East when the Arab world realizes that Israel is its equal and has equal rights."

Olesker left the audience with a challenge to "do something positive as progressives, to build dialogue between Jews and Arabs on this campus."

Following the U of T event, Finkelstein spoke the next night at U of T's Mississauga campus, then at York University last Wednesday night to an audience of more than 300 people. The York crowd, which cheered him sporadically throughout his talk, gave him a standing ovation at the end.

Finkelstein spoke mainly about the Middle East and said that while the Palestinian leadership is corrupt, they're not the real obstacles to peace. He blamed Israel and the United States for continually standing in the way of a two-state solution.

A group of students representing Hillel and the Young Zionist Partnership (YZP) at York University boycotted the lecture in protest of Finkelstein's views on the Holocaust, which he outlined in his book The Holocaust Industry: Reflections on the Exploitation of Jewish Suffering.

"In no way do we accept Finkelstein's views, which are extreme and will serve to promote hatred on campus," said Jordie Saperia, president of Hillel at York.

"In fact, the only people we could find who actually praised and supported Finkelstein were Holocaust deniers like Ernst Zundel, neo-Nazis like the Heritage Front, and their ilk," said YZP president Paul Cooper.

"It is ironic and sad that those same students who claim to be anti-racist are now bringing in a speaker praised and promoted by racists worldwide," Cooper said.

The event, which, organizers said cost $3,727 in security fees, was organized by CUPE 3903 at York University and the group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights.

Arab student Web site at Queen's shut down

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The rector of Queen's University has temporarily shut down a controversial Web site on one of the school's servers while students debate the appropriateness of one of its pages on the Middle East.

For the past two years, the Queen's Arab Students Association (QASA) has displayed an interactive map of the Middle East with no delineation of borders where Israel should be.

The map, labelled Arabia, prominently displayed countries considered part of the Arab world. However, other non-Arab countries were also shown on the map. Palestine is written over the entire area where Israel should be.

It is important that a map on a Queen's University server have accurate information, said Aaron Szamosi, Queen's University Hillel president.

"Israel is a nation recognized by the United Nations and should be labelled appropriately," Szamosi said.

Ahmed Kayssi, Queen's University's rector, said he has spoken with Szamosi about his concerns.

"We have agreed on the need to maintain an open line of communication during these difficult times," he said.

Kayssi's tasks as rector include helping students with issues of racism and other forms of discrimination. He is also the founder of of the Queen's Arabs Students Association and was listed as its webmaster on its site.

However, he said, "I was out of that position for two years, so I asked for the Web site to be taken down."

"I am no longer part of the QASA executive, but will help Aaron Szamosi if he needs anything," Kayssi said.

‘Stuntman Stu’ a star on Ottawa rock radio

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

Stuart Adam Schwartz

OTTAWA — “I’m Stuntman Stu and you’re listening to 106.9 The Bear.”

In these parts, Stuart Adam Schwartz, 29, is known as “Stuntman Stu,” and since 1998, he has been a co-host of The Bear’s Breakfast, the 5:30-9:30 a.m. drive-time show on the popular rock station 106.9 The Bear.

Originally from Montreal, Schwartz moved to Ottawa for school in 1993 and started volunteering at The Bear in 1996. Since then, the funny, smiling Schwartz has carved out a niche as a popular jock known for his wild stunts and witty humour.

“Radio is so personal. You’re going next to someone in their car. You’re going into their kitchen. You’re going into their bathroom, into their bedroom, you’re going everywhere,” he says. “You are following someone through their day.”

Schwartz grew up as an only child in a middle-class family in Dollard des Ormeaux and went to Congregation Beth Tikvah every Shabbat with his parents when he was young.

He describes himself as a normal kid, though “just a little bit off the wall,” because he was the typical class clown who liked to laugh a lot.

As a result, Schwartz can rhyme off a list of Jewish schools he was booted out of while growing up.

He attended, among others, United Talmud Torah, Herzliah High School and Lindsay Place High School and never received top grades.

“My parents didn’t know what to do with me,” he says.

After graduation, he enrolled in Montreal’s Dawson College and started climbing the media ladder. Shmoozing with the press people for the famed Montreal Canadiens the last year they won the Stanley Cup, Schwartz managed to secure a press pass to cover the Canadiens for his television class.

“I remember telling the Canadiens that I worked for Dawson College and saying that 10,000 people watched the newscast, when really it was only 20 people for my television class,” he says, adding that he got to try on goalie Patrick Roy’s pads.

Despite this early success, Schwartz says he didn’t have the passion to continue in the sports media world.

It took him three years, a few threats of expulsion, some summer classes and a couple of night classes before he finally graduated from Dawson.

Heading west, Schwartz enrolled in Ottawa’s Algonquin College in 1993. But failing grades threatened to see him expelled from yet another school. Unwilling to face his parents – again – he smartened up and started Algonquin’s radio program.

In January 1996, more than a year before graduating, he began volunteering at The Bear.

“I chopped up an interview [with then Bear morning co-host Dan “Doc” Halen]. One cassette I handed in for [an] assignment, the other I dropped off for Doc. I said, ‘If ever you need anybody to put away the CDs, I’ll do it.’”

Halen heard the tape and left Schwartz a voice mail message saying he’d love to have him.

Schwartz has been with The Bear ever since, and he started working on its overnight show two months after graduation in 1997.

But how did he become Stuntman Stu?

When the Tragically Hip gave a surprise show at Barrymore’s, a popular Ottawa music hall, in May 1996, he heard that rival station CHEZ 106 was broadcasting from the venue with seven vehicles and its entire staff.

“I said [to Bear management], ‘Send me out.’” he says, his voice rising with excitement, his eyes widening.

“I show up in my crappy Cavalier. I had a BEAR shirt.”

Every time CHEZ 106 would broadcast live from the event, Schwartz had the crowd chant: “The BEAR rocks, CHEZ sucks.”

Returning to The Bear after hijacking the event, he received a standing ovation, and “Stuntman Stu” was born.

He’s since done dozens of stunts, including prank phone calls live on the air, where listeners get “Stu-ed” into believing the calls are true.

At the start of his career, people would often ask him if he changed his name because he was embarrassed to be Jewish.

“Not at all. Let’s be honest, this business is about name-brand recognition,” he said. “[Stuntman Stu] is faster and catchy.”

Schwartz, who gets up at 4 a.m. to be on the air for 5:30, says radio pays terribly until you start to make your mark.

“At the end of the day, to get out of bed at 4 a.m. to do what I do, I love it. I don’t have a job, I don’t work for a living. I play.”

The music blares and somewhere in heaven two bubbies are beaming. Their little Stu is an Ottawa radio star.

“My bubbies [Sadie Rubin and Ruth Schwartz] were my biggest supporters. They were always telling friends what I was doing,” he says.

Retired surgeon chronicles life in book

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Many people looking back on their lives feel compelled to write their memoirs. Unfortunately for reviewers, few have led interesting enough lives for an outsider to want to read about them.

Review

Fortunately, Mindful of the Miracle, a new memoir by Mannie Stein (Malcolm Lester & Associates), is not one of those books.

Stein, a retired surgeon, was born in Lithuania in 1920 and has lived in South Africa, Britain and Israel. He now resides in Toronto.

His life began without fanfare in a shtetl northeast of Kaunas.

"Our home was a modest one, but, as was typical of shtetl life, it was also warm and sustaining," he writes. "Festive meals were feasts – soup, borscht, gehackteh lebber, lokshen and potato puddings, chicken and, always served last, gribones (fried chicken fat)."

Economic hardship forced many eastern European Jews to emigrate. In 1926, Stein's family left for South Africa – in hindsight, a shrewd move, considering the fate of so many eastern European Jews in the 20 years that followed.

The Steins settled in Durban, and in a short time, Mannie learned English and began to display his academic brilliance.

He was 16 when he went to medical school in Johannesburg, where he studied for six years.

After a two-year internship, he writes, "I could take out an appendix, fix a hernia, tap a chest, open an abdomen, even open a skull by myself."

Mannie Stein with his wife Lola in Scotland in 1946.

By the time he was 32, he was a surgical specialist in Durban, South Africa, with his own practice, and brimming with ambition.

There are interesting anecdotes throughout the book about early – almost primitive – surgical procedures. During the post-war era, surgical methods were developing rapidly and Stein was fortunate to be in the thick of things as he learned and adapted to new procedures.

After his marriage to Lola Jankelson, Stein continued postgraduate studies in London, Edinburgh and Dublin. He obtained a fellowship in surgery and diplomas in gynecology and obstetrics and anesthesia.

He never stopped studying and improving himself. Even after setting up his own practice and establishing a solid reputation, he frequently travelled abroad to attend lectures on new surgical techniques.

He is credited with introducing vascular surgery to Durban in 1958.

"The fact that I was able to innovate, to pioneer, to be bold rather than reticient, gives me a great deal of satisfaction," he writes.

The book's chapters are separated by testimonials from people thanking him for saving their lives.

Stein also describes the political situation in South Africa during the apartheid era. It is ironic to read about an eastern European Jew talking about racism from the outside.

"Jewish people, on balance, treated their servants [blacks and coloureds] better than the majority of the white population of South Africans did… [We] tried to ensure that our servants had proper personal and household amenities that protected their fundamental inherent dignity."

In 1985, Stein retired and moved to Israel before coming to Toronto a few years later. He is an honorary life member of the College of Medicine of South Africa, a life member of the Medical Association of South Africa and a member of the Vascular Society of North America.

Asper-insired museum calls for architectural submissions

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The late Israel Asper's last and possibly most ambitious philanthropic endeavour is a step closer to fruition.

Representatives of the Asper family, the Asper Foundation and the three levels of government ceremonially turned the sod on Oct. 24 for the new $270-million Canadian Museum for Human Rights.

A few minutes earlier at a packed press conference, the Friends of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights Inc. announced the official launch of a worldwide architectural competition to design the museum.

Moe Levy, executive director of the Asper Foundation and MC for the morning, noted that Asper was scheduled to make the announcement himself on Oct. 7 at a meeting of the Assembly of First Nations in Vancouver. That was the morning he died of a heart attack.

"We are devastated by his passing," Levy said.

The press conference began with a clip of an interview Asper did for CBC on July 29. In the interview, he envisioned Queen Elizabeth, Nelson Mandela and the descendants of Martin Luther King and Mahatma Gandhi coming to Winnipeg in 2007 or 2008 for the official opening of the museum.

"There is a tendency among Canadians to aim for the middle," Asper told the interviewer. "We should be reaching for the stars."

He saw the museum as an international icon the equivalent of Big Ben in London and the Eiffel Tower in Paris.

At the groundbreaking, Winnipeg Mayor Glen Murray said it was a great privilege for him to have known Israel Asper and heard him express his passion for his community and country. Murray spoke of the importance of human rights in holding Canada together. He recalled some of the stains of the past, such as the residential schools for native children, the university quotas for Jewish and other eastern European students and the Chinese Exclusion Act.

"We are travelling on a Canadian journey of social rights and inclusiveness," Murray said. "This museum will serve to inspire the imagination. It is our duty to take up the torch from Israel Asper and make his passion and his dream our own."

Following comments from representatives of the provincial and federal governments – Levy noted that Ottawa has pledged $30 million for the project – Asper's daughter Gail Asper, managing director of the Asper Foundation, announced major gifts of $500,000 each from the Manitoba-based Wawanesa Insurance Company and Morley and Marjorie Blankstein, as well as pledges from others.

Marjorie Blankstein said she and her husband contributed because of their desire to support Izzy Asper, because the museum will provide a major boost to the city and because it is a positive, proactive project.

"Thirteen years ago, I had the opportunity to visit Auschwitz and Buchenwald," she said. "I saw what prejudice and hatred can do."

Gail Lord, a consultant to the project, introduced the members of the international jury that will evaluate the architectural submissions. They include Gail Asper; Levy; historian Michael Bliss; leading Canadian journalist Robert Fulford; Victor Rabinovitch, president and CEO of the Canadian Museum of Civilization; architects David Covo and Raymond Moriyama, heads of the schools of architecture at McGill and Brock universities respectively; Gustavo Da Roza, former head of architecture at the University of Manitoba; and Roisin Heneghan, winning architect for the Grand Egyptian Museum Competition.

The time line for choosing the winning design was announced: architects from around the world will have until mid-December to enter their submissions. Thirty of the submissions will be selected and then narrowed to eight semi-finalists. Three finalists will be selected around the end of March 2004, with the winner to be announced on July 1, 2004. The three finalists will be awarded $100,000 each.

ANNOUNCING

THE BRONFMAN YOUTH FELLOWSHIPS IN ISRAEL 2004

For the eighteenth consecutive summer, a group of outstanding Jewish teenagers in the U.S. and Canada, coming from a wide variety of backgrounds and entering the twelfth grade of school, will be recipients of the BronfmanYouth Fellowships.* They will spend five fulfilling weeks of study, dialogue and travel in Israel.

The Bronfman Fellows will be selected on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the program's selection standard. Fellowship activities begin July 5th, with a return from Israel August 11th. All meals will be kosher, and Sabbath activities will be in keeping with the sanctity of the day.

While in Israel, the Fellows will engage in an intense interaction with a diverse faculty of master educators, representing a wide range of Jewish perspectives. They will explore Jewish texts against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs, meet with Amitei Bronfman, our parallel Israeli fellowship and take part, at a time of rapid change, in seminars with some of the country's leading political and cultural figures. Simultaneously, they will debate a constant flow of ideas and search for insights on the various ways to define oneself as a Jew today - all in an atmosphere of mutual respect and open dialogue.

Upon returning home, the Fellows participate in a series of seminars, a weekend with the Israeli Fellows, and a wide range of alumni activities, programs and projects, all aimed at promoting our goals of commitment, pluralism, study and dialogue. For many Fellows, the summer in Israel is just the beginning of a lifelong association with fellow "Bronfmanim."

* Fellowships cover roundtrip transportation between New York and Israel, educational programming, room and board and travel in Israel.

Completed applications must be postmarked by January30, 2004

Circumpolar tours open doors, says John Ralston Saul

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – John Ralston Saul defended Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson's recent state visits to Russia, Finland and Iceland as necessary if Canada, a medium-sized country, is to attract international attention.

Saul, who accompanied his wife on the circumpolar tour Sept. 23 to Oct. 15, along with some 50 Canadians prominent in a variety of fields, said the visits were "necessary" and "happen all the time" and have been "for hundreds of years."

Earlier governors general have also travelled abroad, and Rideau Hall receives three or four official visits a year, he said at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

Saul, an author and philosopher, delivered the annual Helen and Sam Steinberg Lecture.

The visits have been widely criticized for their reported cost of $1 million. Clarkson and another delegation will make similar visits to Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Greenland in the spring.

Small and medium-sized countries have to use intelligent and imaginative ways to get noticed. Trips like this one actually produce "more bang for the buck," he said.

"We can't afford to be ignored. We have to find a way to enter the consciousness of other people."

Taking Canadians "at the height of their careers" in the arts, science, economics and other fields on a visit with the country's head of state "created a new image of Canada and captured the attention of people… They think about Canada as an interesting place… The whole press was talking about Canada," he said.

Saul said this type of tour "opens doors… people think about doing business with Canada, or signing treaties."

Saul added that the itinerary was not just endless state dinners, but an attempt to "engage [their hosts] intellectually." There were roundtable discussions on culture, economics, immigration and citizenship, among other topics.

He also noted the sacrifice made by the delegates in going on the trip. "These are people at the top of their careers, mostly self-employed, yet they put aside their own interests, not out of cheap patriotism… but in order to act as citizens."

The visits will also strengthen Canadians' sense of themselves as a "northern nation."

With most living along the southern border of the country, Canadians tend to forget that they have six neighbouring countries around the Arctic Ocean.

"Canada is the leading northern country. Although smaller than Russia, it is healthier economically and socially. We must demonstrate that we can be leaders in the north," Saul said.

The trip also made anglophones and francophones more conscious of the aboriginal presence in Canada. At most official events, he said, anglophones and francophones are used to dividing the time between themselves.

"On this trip, the dominant group was the aboriginals. It was fascinating to watch the anglophones and francophones as they realized it was not going to be 50-50 for them. By the end of the trip, they were proud to see the Inuit, Dene and others speaking on behalf of the group."

The title of Saul's lecture was "Citizen Engagement in the New Nation State," but he ranged over a wide territory reflecting on the future of western civilization, globalization and the nature of nationality.

Saul warned young people against turning away from politics and engaging in public affairs only through "single-interest" organizations. While these groups are influential, their power will always be limited unless they follow the "boring" democratic process of getting elected and passing legislation.

He blamed the "political elites" themselves for having turned the young off this process by handing over more and more control to the forces of international economics.

Saul argued that globalization is not inevitable, nor is the nation state in decline. By nation state, he said, he means not one based on a single ethnicity or culture, but "a new kind of society" where it is "bizarre" not to have "multiple personalities."

GUY PIERCE – Living With Hope

I was 21 years old and a fighter in the 890 parachutes battalion. On Sunday, December 8, 2002, our unit received information about a booby-trapped vehicle targeting Israeli civilians. We went on a routine patrol mission in Tul-Karem to search for this car.

Ten minutes after we entered the city, a side explosive charge hit our vehicle on the driver side.

As a result both my legs were blown off on the spot.

I did not know who was against whom, whether or not the terrorists were nearby, or what would happen next.

We were unable to report this incident to our headquarters. The charge had knocked out our electrical and communication systems. As the troops in the back of our jeep opened their doors to help us, they were attacked by heavy gunfire. They quickly retaliated from inside the jeep.

At Beit Halochem, I have seen people paralyzed from the neck down, blinded and in worse condition than myself. I have no legs but I am happy. I feel that the most difficult moments in life are behind me: true, being disabled is hard – but with the help of my family, friends and Beit Halochem, I will soon be walking with my prostheses.

At Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv, I use the fitness-room, receive physiotherapy and swim regularly. It is a place where I can meet my friends and feel comfortable. Thank you for helping not only me, but also the thousands of disabled using the Centres, who each have their own tragic experience.

Winnipeg BB to honour garment industry leader

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — On Nov. 12, B'nai Brith Canada will recognize community leader Robert (Bob) Silver with its Award of Merit.

"I don't think I really deserve this award," says Silver, the co-owner of the Winnipeg Free Press and the president of Western Glove Works, one of the world's largest jean manufacturers. "I do some charity work and some community work, but a lot of other people do the same things with the same drive, energy and commitment. I am accepting this award on behalf of all those other volunteers."

The honour is awarded every second year here based on an individual's contributions to the larger community. Previous Award of Merit recipients include the late Israel Asper, former Manitoba premier Gary Filmon, former Canadian foreign minister and Winnipeg-area MP Lloyd Axworthy and, most recently, Winnipeg businessman Sanford Riley.

Silver's initial foray into community work came about through his business interests. "Most of my community work has been outside the Jewish community," he says. "I think it is important to have leaders in the wider community who are Jewish."

Alan Yusim, B'nai Brith's executive director in Winnipeg, agrees, saying Silver has earned the award through a "distinguished pattern of leadership that has contributed to the business and social fibre of his community."

"Bob is special in that he has stayed and dedicated himself to Winnipeg and Manitoba where others have picked up and left long ago," Yusim adds.

Silver actually did leave once, but he came back. After graduating from the University of Manitoba in 1970, he went west to British Columbia to try communal living. He returned in 1973 to take over the family business, Western Glove Works (WGW – the company used to make gloves but now makes jeans and casual wear.)

In 1973, WGW had annual revenues of $3 million. In 1981, when Silver and some partners bought the company outright, WGW was earning $9 million a year.Today, through natural growth as well as acquisition, the company has revenues in the $200-million range and a workforce of 1,300.

Two years ago, Silver and partner Ron Stern (who is based in Vancouver) expanded into the news business when they bought the Winnipeg Free Press and the Brandon Sun. Last year, they added Warehouse One, a chain of jeans stores, to their growing business empire.

Silver's community service has him serving on the boards of the Manitoba Fashion Institute, Winnipeg Enterprises Corporation, the Manitoba Business Council, Destination Winnipeg, the Winnipeg Library Foundation and the Smart Winnipeg advisory board. He is also chairman of the University of Manitoba Smart Park and the City of Winnipeg's Library Millenium Campaign, as well as co-chair of the Premier's Economic Advisory Council.

"Once I became involved in community work in general; I thought it appropriate that I also work on behalf of my own community, particularly after the opening of the Asper Jewish Community Campus in 1997," Silver says.

In the Jewish community, he is a member of the board of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and heads the Winnipeg Jewish Federation/Combined Jewish Appeal's Grow Winnipeg initiative. The year-old program aims to increase the city's Jewish population by encouraging immigration and persuading younger members of the community to stay or return after university elsewhere.

"On the immigration front, we are doing well, and we are beginning to make some inroads in encouraging our children to stay," Silver says.

"We are doing some surveys and fact-finding so that we have more concrete information rather than having to rely on anecdotal material."

Halifax boasts first-ever Jewish film festival

By SHAYLA HOWELL
Special to The CJN

HALIFAX — Halifax played host to the first ever Atlantic Jewish Film Festival (AJFF) Oct. 25 to Oct. 30, joining the ranks of cities that celebrate Judaism through cinema.

Fourteen films were screened over the six days, and though final numbers aren't yet available, festival organizers seemed pleased with the attendance.

Opening night saw close to 200 people attend the screening of Gloomy Sunday, a 2001 German-language love story set in 1930s Budapest, and near that amount for the next night's showing of the documentary about Orthodox gays and lesbians Trembling Before G-d. Other highlights were the Sing-a-long Sound of Music and the American "Jews-ploitation" spoof The Hebrew Hammer.

Organizers said the response to the festival suggests there's a demand for Jewish cinema that's not being met in Halifax.

"There's certainly a market for this," said Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council, the festival's founding sponsor. "But I was impressed that a lot of the general public showed up."

Jewish film festivals are nothing new in cities such as Toronto and Montreal, but the small Jewish population in Halifax – an estimated 1,500 to 1,800 people – has virtually no history of experiencing Jewish cinema in a large setting.

"We've had showings of Jewish films, singly, in the community," Goldberg said, "but nothing to the community at large."

That's what founding committee member Elizabeth Pink set out to change. "We love film and we love Jewish film, and I'm tired of having to go find these films when I travel to bigger cities because they don't come to Halifax."

Moreover, she said, most of the films programmed for the festival are not available at local video stores.

The committee hopes the festival will bring Jewish cinema to the entire Halifax community, Jews and non-Jews alike.

"The festival caters to a whole new audience– to people who are interested in the topic but who wouldn't attend lectures," said committee member and Dalhousie University student Naomi Goloff.

Linda Law, a marketing consultant and committee member, said "the AJFF has an ambassador's role to play as well.

"For people outside the Jewish community, this is what it means to be Jewish – these are the issues we deal with. This is how Jewish life and culture have had an impact on the general population beyond the Yiddish expressions we use."

The AJFF did experience problems, however. Some of the screenings had turnouts of just 75 people, and Goldberg said he's heard complaints that the program offered too many documentaries – nine out of the 14 films were documentaries.

Nevertheless, according to Law, the festival is "on track to break even" and organizers are planning to make it an annual event.

"Even if it's only 75 people, that's 75 people who are watching films and discussing the topics after," Law said.

"We had people gathering in the lobby and out on the sidewalk talking about the movie they just saw. I will definitely participate next year."

What she has to offer you is a man of moral substance, a man who is commitment-minded and is serious about finding someone very special. (it also does not hurt that he is extremely handsome!)

Here is his message to you!
I am looking for a woman with whom I can enjoy all the wonderful things life has to offer. Life has dealt me a kind hand and I am ready to share it with a special woman who loves children and is looking forward to being a mother, enjoys the comforts of a home, a woman who can appreciate the finer things in life, but is not at all driven by them. It is important for me to be with someone who is down to earth and centered; her actions are a result of her own will and not the will of others. She respects her body and takes care of herself.

Does this sound like you? Do you know this person? Does this sound like your daughter? Niece? Cousin? Best friend? Would you or they NEVER answer a personal ad? Then we need to speak to YOU! Janis Spindel would like to invite you to attend our events in Toronto and Montreal.

Hamilton film fest raises funds for the community

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — The fourth annual Hamilton Jewish Film Festival is virtually a one-man project for organizer Joel Starkman, who admits that his interest in film is minimal.

Though not especially keen on film, Starkman does want to develop cultural projects in Hamilton that encourage involvement in the Jewish community, and he feels the festival is a great way to raise money to that end.

And since films have a wide appeal, the festival, which runs from Nov. 11 to Nov. 18, is a relatively easy fundraising project to promote, he said.

"The film festival is an easy project because most people like films. The hard work, creating the films, has already been done."

Profits from this year's festival will go to the recently established Hamilton Jewish Cultural Fund, which will sponsor future cultural events in the city, including a jazz concert and art auction scheduled for February.

Starkman said he anticipates the cultural fund will have about $18,000 by the end of this year. About one-third will be available during the year for upcoming projects.

The Jewish Community Centre of Hamilton is the festival's umbrella organization for the second year. Films will be screened at various locations, including all three local synagogues, and ticket sales involve the help of local Hebrew schools. The Art Gallery of Hamilton is sponsoring two of the films.

One of the highlights of the festival is Capturing the Freidmans, a documentary directed by New York filmmaker Andrew Jarecki that revisits one of the most infamous child-abuse cases of the 1980s. It won the Grand Jury Documentary Prize at the Sundance Film Festival.

Another featured film at is Relentless: The Struggle for Peace in Israel, a one-hour documentary that uses primary source video clips to examine the history of the Mideast conflict and examine how the peace process unravelled in a surge of violence. Neil Beube, the Canadian representative of the film, will conduct a question-and-answer session after the screening.

Also featured will be Nowhere in Africa, a love story focusing on a Jewish family that flees the Nazi regime in 1938 for a remote farm in Kenya. The film won the 2002 Academy Award for Best Foreign Language Film.

Hamilton's Adele Reinhartz, the dean of graduate studies at Wilfred Laurier University, will present an illustrated lecture in conjunction with the launching of her new book, Scripture on the Silver Screen. She will discuss how the Bible has been used in many mainstream Hollywood films.

Tickets for individual days of the film festival are $8, while a festival pass is $36. Tickets and passes are available at Hamilton-area Hebrew schools and the Jewish Community Centre of Hamilton. Popcorn, lemonade, and bottled water are included in the admission charge. The complete festival schedule can be found on the Jewish Hamilton Web site at www.jewishhamilton.org.

'Best of Hebrew U' returns to Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The third annual "Best of Hebrew U" event, scheduled for the end of November, will offer Ontario teachers a continuing education credit in Jewish studies through the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education for the first time this year.

Derek Penslar

The program, at the Inn on the Park, kicks off Nov. 22 with a Saturday evening keynote address by political scientist Reuven Hazan on "Terrorism and Democracy: Lessons from Israel." Lecture topics the following day range from politics to art, medicine and literature.

A concluding panel discussion moderated by Derek Penslar, director of the Jewish studies program at the University of Toronto, will address "Internal or External Problems: Which Pose Greater Challenges for Israel?"

With the exception of Penslar and Martin Lockshin, director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, who will speak briefly at the beginning of the Sunday program, the academics to be featured at the event are all affiliated with Hebrew University.

Dan Gazit, an associate professor in Hebrew U's faculty of dental medicine, will discuss his research on gene therapy for osteoporosis as well as his space shuttle experiments with Israel's first astronaut, Ilan Ramon, who died when the space shuttle Columbia exploded on re-entry at the end of its mission earlier this year.

Topics addressed by other Hebrew U faculty include "Your Child and Theology;" "The Importance of Place in Jewish Literature: Jerusalem and New York;" "Saving our Heritage: The Rescue Operation by the Center for Jewish Art;" and "Israeli Attitudes Toward the Peace Process: What the Media Does Not Tell Us."

Martin Lockshin

The event has a dual purpose, says Stanley Kugelmass, who is co-chairing it with his wife Margery Hecht-Kugelmass. One is to raise awareness of the importance of Hebrew University as an active place of learning in Israel. The other is to create an opportunity for Jewish learning on various topics by "taking advantage of world-class expertise in a quiet, reflective atmosphere."

Kugelmass hopes Hebrew U alumni will be well-represented at the event. An alumnus himself, he met his wife as a student in the university's one-year program for overseas students.

For further information or to register, go to www.cfhu.org, or call 416-485-8000. The deadline for early registration is Nov. 10.

Muslim anti-Semitism needs a good airing

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

Canada's influential electronic media continue to pay insufficient attention to Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad's Oct.16 speech to the 57-nation Organization of Islamic Countries (OIC), in which he slandered the Jews, with comments including "Jews rule the world by proxy" and "get others to fight and die for them."

Still, a couple of programs did address the subject, to one degree or another. On Oct. 24, TVOntario's Diplomatic Immunity devoted most of its time to Mahathir. Special guest Ronald Steel, of the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations, downplayed the significance of the Malaysian prime minister's anti-Semitic rant. Instead, Steel tried to emphasize other elements of the speech in which Mahathir called on Muslims to take charge of their own affairs. Panelist Patrick Martin of the Globe and Mail, while denouncing Mahathir's anti-Semitism, made essentially the same point.

But it is clear from Mahathir's text that he is urging Muslims to advance by fighting back (non-violently) against the "humiliation" and domination by the Europeans and the Jews. He does not advise doing so by turning to independent reasoning, but rather by uniting, especially over Palestine, to form a united ummah, the worldwide community of believers. Further reading shows that it is the Jews alone who are Mahathir's true target, singled out for their "proxy war" against 1.3 billion Muslims. Rather than being merely a passing reference, Mahathir's obsession with the Jewish "conspiracy" is central to his argument and can in no way be minimized.

The Economist magazine (Oct. 23) argued that Mahathir's remarks "are more likely to encourage violence, not reduce it."

The two other Diplomatic Immunity panelists, Michael Bell, former Canadian ambassador to Israel, and Jonathan Kay of the National Post espoused this second position. Bell was particularly forceful on this matter.

Mahathir's claim that Muslims must solve their problems by using the intellect, not violence, according to the Economist "is utterly subverted by reinforcing the notion that Israel, or rather the conflict between Arabs and Jews, epitomizes the Moslems' problems. It doesn't. Bad government, and dysfunctional social and religious institutions, are what does."

As It Happens, The Current, Foreign Assignment – indeed all of CBC Radio's numerous current affairs programs – did not confront the Mahathir canard at all. Only Michael Enright, in his own finely crafted introduction to CBC Radio's Sunday Edition (Oct. 26), devoted time to the issue of anti-Semitism. He quoted Mahathir, but did not deal with the issue of how anti-Semitism was endorsed by the OIC's leaders, nor its frightening increase throughout the Islamic world.

> 'The psychological grounds for the final solution are being prepared'

Enright also spoke about the scandal at the New Republic, where Greg Easterbrook, one of the editors, blamed Jewish Hollywood executives for promoting violence in a recently released film. Unlike Mahathir, who said the storm of international protest over his diatribe only confirmed his thesis about Jewish power, Easterbrook apologized immediately for his slight.

In the Oct. 24 Washington Post, columnist Charles Krauthammer wrote about the Easterbrook affair. He emphasized the far more frightening development of Muslim-led anti-Semitic conspiracy theories, and concluded: "The world is experiencing the worst resurgence of anti-Semitism in 50 years. Its main objective is the demonization and delegitimization of Israel, to the point that the idea of eradicating, indeed obliterating, the world's only Jewish state becomes respectable, indeed laudable. The psychological grounds for the final solution are being prepared."

In his Oct. 27 National Post column, headlined "Pragmatic anti-Semites," George Jonas sounded a similar alarm. He noted that the "big problem" is not Mahathir's crude anti-Semitism, but rather "that 57 world leaders applauded him… It presages a catastrophe."

CBC and other Canadian electronic media must devote serious attention to these frightening warnings.

Canada's new envoy to Israel sets goals

In an interview with The CJN, Sinclair described Canada-Israel relations as excellent.

"Canada is a firm supporter of Israel and its quest for security," he said. "We have links that stretch across trade, cultural, judicial, sport and indeed every conceivable aspect of a state-to-state relationship. We have our differences, but these should not and do not obscure the fundamental values we share as democracies. "

Asked if Canada should be less neutral in the ongoing conflict, he said, "I don't believe it is a matter of choosing sides. Canada has always been both pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian. Peace is a win-win situation for both."

Sinclair said Canada's "deep and durable" ties with Israel have grown and developed over the years.

But he suggested the relationship can be upgraded.

"There is a real bilateral partnership to be developed. It is a broad-based relationship which needs to encompass political issues as well as culture and trade."

Citing trade promotion as "a key aspect" of the budding relationship, Sinclair said, "Trade has grown rapidly since the 1997 free trade agreement, but more can be done."

Israel has a vibrant, diversified, hi-tech economy, and Canadians should better understand Israel's accomplishments and opportunities, he said.

"There are great complimentarities between our two economies and scope for much more," he said.

Sinclair said he will also try to improve cultural exchanges.

"Canadian artists and performers in the areas of dance, music, film and literature have been showcasing their talents and sharing their creativity with Israelis, even during periods of heightened tension and violence."

Sinclair said Canada will work for a peaceful resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that ensures the security of Israel and fulfils the vision of a two-state solution.

"This is not a dream. This is achievable."

Sinclair is gratified that Israel and the Palestinian Authority accepted the road map peace plan as a basis for moving the peace process forward.

But he is a realist.

"It is admittedly difficult," he said, referring to the recent spate of violence that has beset the road map. "It is clear that terrorism must end."

In his view, Israel's peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan, though hardly warm, constitute "an important start" to Middle East peacemaking and bring a measure of stability to the region.

Canada can play a role in facilitating peace, he said.

"We are well-placed through our policies and relationships to press for practical and achievable steps to promote peace. We have our our own areas of expertise and can call on the talents of many Canadians who want to contribute to peace."

Sinclair said he requested the posting to Tel Aviv.

"I had the privilege of serving in Israel and always wanted to return.

"I was struck, in the 1980s, as now, by the complexity of life in Israel – the challenges, the enormous achievements in such a short period of time, the dynamism of political and social debate, the beauty of the land and Israel's vibrancy – which is very contagious."

Sinclair admires Israelis and their accomplishments, which, he said, were achieved under the most difficult circumstances.

Since leaving Israel after his first posting, he has returned many times for bilateral discussions on arms control issues.

And when he was director of the Department of Foreign Affairs' Middle East division, he travelled to Israel regularly for political consultations.

In July, Sinclair was notified that he would replace Michael Bell as ambassador. It's Sinclair's first ambassadorship.

"I had extensive conversations with him before coming to Israel. Michael and I are old colleagues. We have worked together on the Middle East for more than 20 years. He provided me with well-informed advice as to how to do the job effectively and on the situation on the ground. Michael is an invaluable source to me in explaining the diversity and range of views in Israel."

Before his departure, Sinclair and his partner, Jill, who was appointed Canada's special co-ordinator for the peace process this past summer and was previously posted to Prague and Havana, met with Jewish community members, entrepreneurs conducting business in Israel, and Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada.

Sinclair will be in charge of a staff of 53 employees, 17 Canadians and 36 Israelis.

His grasp of Hebrew is limited.

"It was much better 20 years ago, when I had the chance to take some lessons," he said, adding he hopes to take lessons in the near future.

Asked whether he is apprehensive about the security situation in Israel, he said, "Certainly, the security factor is a concern for all Israelis and all who live here. Terrorism is both non-discriminatory and random. All staff take precautions."

Holocaust exhibit focuses on role of women

By SHIRA HONIG
CJN Staff

Ruzhka Korczak felt as if she had the weight of womankind on her shoulders when she was chosen for her first assignment as a member of the United Organization of Partisans (UPO) in the Rudniki forests of Poland during World War II.

"If we succeed in our mission, we pave the way for all other women," she said. "After we stood the test, there was almost no operation without the participation of women."

Korczak's and other women's wartime experiences are the subject of a new exhibit at the Koffler Centre for the Arts that runs until Nov. 11 as part of Holocaust Education Week.

Conceived by Yonat Rotbein, Korczak's daughter, "Women in the Holocaust: Faces of Resistance" builds on the premise that the role of women during the Nazi period has rarely before been acknowledged. The exhibit weaves together the biographies of women, both known and unknown, into a comprehensive and poignant Holocaust narrative.

Though Korczak's story may be familiar to people well-versed in Holocaust history – she was profiled in The Avengers by Rich Cohen, [illegible]ewish Resistance fighters – she is not a known figure to most.

When Hitler entered Poland in 1939, Korczak was 18. A member of Hashomer Hatzair, a Zionist youth movement, she had learned to use a gun and left home to join the Resistance, planning to come back. Instead, Korczak became a central figure in the UPO, which was known for its acts of sabotage against German targets. She died in Israel in 1988.

Rotbein, the educational director of Moreshet Holocaust Research and Study Centre at Givat Haviva in Israel, grew up listening to her mother's stories and began planning "Women in the Holocaust: Faces of Resistance" two years ago. Since then, the project has grown to include educational materials for schools and a videocassette of testimonies. A print anthology is also planned.

The exhibit, which is being shown for the first time, will be touring other cities in Canada and the United States following its run in Toronto. It is co-sponsored by Canadian Friends of Givat Haviva (CFGH) and the National Council of Jewish Women. For more information or to organize group tours, call Miriam at the CFGH office at 416-736-9655. In Israel, call Moreshet director Amira Hagani at 011-972-4-630-9204 or e-mail her at ahagani@gan.org.il.

Montreal writer joins unique mission to Auschwitz

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A devout Muslim kneeling with his face on the floor, praying in the shadow of one of the towers overlooking the wall of Auschwitz-Birkenau; a young Arab Israeli scout and a survivor of Auschwitz, crying together and sharing their pain; the names of victims of the Shoah read out alternately by Jewish and Arab voices – these are scenes that should appear idealistic and unreal to the ordinary human being.

But Montreal Jewish writer Naim Kattan witnessed these unusual, moving scenes during a recent visit to Auschwitz, together with 500 Jews and Arabs of different backgrounds – a first in the annals of difficult Judeo-Arab relations.

One hundred and fifty Israeli Arabs, primarily Muslims; 150 Israeli Jews; and 200 religious and secular Arabs and Jews from France and Belgium, participated in this unusual, multi-denominational gathering organized by a tireless militant for peace, Father Emile Shoufani, Priest of Nazareth.

Several rabbis and imams from Israel's Jewish and Arab communities, including rabbis Yehoshua Engleman and Avi Gisser, spiritual leader of the West Bank city of Ofra, as well as Jewish, Muslim, Catholic and Protestant spiritual leaders from several European countries, responded eagerly to the call sent out several months ago by the association Mémoire pour la Paix, created by Father Shoufani and his close friend, French theologian and editor Jean Mouttapa.

"To see Jews and Arabs gather together on a scorched land where humanity and barbarism reached their zenith was an existential, unique and upsetting experience.

"To speak Arabic one day with Arabs is something I never expected to do in my lifetime," says an emotional Naim Kattan, the only Canadian participant in this trip to Poland.

This was the first time the writer and literary critic who was born in Baghdad and has lived in Canada for 40 years, visited Auschwitz.

Father Shoufani asked everyone in the group to set aside political and ideological disagreements for a short time and try to work together to renew a truly human relationship.

"This trip was harmonious and fruitful because it was based on two clear principles: there would be no religious or national symbols and no reciprocity sought.

"This intercommunity gathering had no political purpose. Its aim was not to restart Arab-Israeli dialogue. We were there only to share emotion and memory," Kattan explains.

"Arabs, who are often exposed to dishonest anti-Israel and anti-Jewish propaganda, discovered for the first time that innocent Jews had been assassinated in cold blood, gassed alive and burned in crematoria ovens, merely because they were Jewish. They understood that the Shoah calls out to and concerns all the peoples of the world, including those who were not involved in any way."

A survivor of Auschwitz, Ida Grinspan, deported to the death camp on Feb. 13, 1944, when she was only 14, and Shlomo Venezia, one of the last Sonderkommandos still alive (deported, charged with transporting to the crematoria oven the bodies of Jews who had been gassed), described to the Judeo-Arab delegation the different steps of the genocidal process developed by the Nazis.

"The testimony of these survivors was staggering. They told us every detail of the bestiality of the conditions of internment, the different steps of a meticulously planned extermination, the humiliation of being undressed, the shaving of the hair, the tattooing," Kattan says.

Father Shoufani is absolutely convinced that a shared memory of the Shoah can contribute to peace between Jews and Arabs.

The Saint-Joseph of Nazareth school, of which he has been director for about 30 years, has become a centre for Judeo-Arab dialogue in Israel. He regularly organizes meetings between the students in his school and students from a Jewish school in Jerusalem. Every year, he has his students visit Yad Vashem, the memorial centre dedicated to the six million victims of the Holocaust.

He was approached a few years ago to become the Bishop of Galilee, but the prelates close to the Palestinian nationalists were firmly opposed to his nomination. Clearly, Father Shoufani's attempts to bring together Jews and Arabs were never unanimously accepted in the Palestinian Arab camp. Some Arab Israeli politicians even asked him to cancel his trip to Auschwitz.

"I was harshly attacked by the Arab politicians who criticized me for organizing this trip to Auschwitz at a time when the Palestinians are being harshly repressed by the government of Ariel Sharon. They strongly suggested that I cancel this gathering, because they felt there was no return from the Jewish side and no political gain for the Palestinians.

"During the war in Iraq, many people, both Arabs and Jews, also asked me to delay the trip. They felt that it was not an appropriate time to carry out this project. However, I continued to think that the tense situation we are living in and the numerous difficulties facing us today were good reasons to encourage us to make this trip," Father Shoufani says.

Participating in a trip to Auschwitz is not "betraying the cause of one's own people, nor does it mean forgetting everything that still separates the Jews and the Arabs," says the Israeli citizen who speaks fluent Hebrew.

"This only goal of this trip was to finally enlighten the horizon, to put aside our disputes, no matter how serious they may be, to prevent the emergencies of the moments from blinding us, to stop the infernal cycle of vengeance.

"I believe that only an experience of this kind can give confidence the chance to be reborn. My position is this: I want to understand the Jewish world and its reaction, in order to re-establish a dialogue with that world, but I do not want to propose any equivalence with my suffering, and I do not ask, 'Who is the victim?'

"Now, I have taken the initiative and gone to join the Jewish world in the indescribable suffering that marked the Shoah, but I do not ask anything in return, because that is not the goal of the step I took. If the Jewish world also believes it must take this step, it is their business," says Father Shoufani.

Wasserman among inductees to Quebec

MONTREAL — Dora Wasserman, founding artistic director of the Yiddish Theatre of the Saidye Bronfman Centre (SBC), was inducted as a Chevalier of the Ordre national du Quebec in a ceremony at the National Assembly last week.

"She transmitted her love for this theatre to new generations of actors and audiences of all ages," read her commendation from the Quebec government. "Over nearly 40 years, [she] chose and staged more than 70 plays. Some were classic Yiddish works and others were drawn from the international and Quebec repertoire; many are original creations."

The commendation noted Wasserman made a major contribution to theatre in Quebec, reaching out beyond the traditonal Jewish audience to anglophones and francophones as well.

Wasserman worked for nearly 50 years in the Yiddish theatre after her arrival in Montreal in 1950, as a director and actor. The Yiddish Theatre was established as a resident company of the SBC when it opened in 1967. Today, it is the only resident Yiddish theatre company in North America.

She was appointed to the Order of Canada 10 years ago and more recently received the Prix Hommage for lifetime achievement from the Quebec theatrical community.

Also inducted last week as a Grand Officier, the Ordre's highest rank, was violinist and conductor Ethel Stark.

Stark founded the internationally recognized Montreal Women's Symphony and is also founder and director of the New York Women's Chamber Orchestra and the Symphonietta Ethel Stark. She has worked with many Montreal and Toronto orchestras and has been a guest conductor here and abroad.

Architect and sculptor Melvin Charney, who was named an Officier of the Ordre, is known for his contemporrary works, as well as his influential art criticism and theory.

Healthy ways to satisfy the after-school snack attack

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When children come home from school, they usually want one thing and they want it fast: food.

It doesn't matter whether your children are in kindergarten or high school. When they walk into the house after school they generally head right to the kitchen to refill. Many schools serve lunch very early in the day, and by the time the children get home in the afternoon, they are ravenous. In Israel, students bring a snack to school to eat at 10 a.m., and they eat lunch later in the day. Nevertheless, they still come home from school wanting food as quickly as possible.

Try to keep a supply of good-tasting, good-for-you treats to satisfy the after-school snack attack. My neighbour keeps a platter of cut up fresh vegetables out on the kitchen table so that when her six school-age children arrive home, this is the first thing they see in the kitchen, and while they're deciding what they want to eat, they all munch on the healthy vegetables.

As the weather gets colder, a good idea is to have your crock pot going with a healthy vegetable soup or stew that can be immediately available. It's unlikely to ruin their appetite for dinner, and even if it does, they will have eaten something that's healthy rather than snacking on junk food.

Young children like to make snacks fun. Let them play with their food – within reason. Building a fort with carrot sticks can be much more enticing than simply munching on them.

Steer your children away from colas and other caffeine and sugar-laden drinks and toward fruit juices and milk.

Here are some ideas for quick after school snacks:

- Frozen fruit slushies or smoothies. Use your children's favourite combination of fresh or frozen fruits, crushed ice, milk and low-fat yogurt or frozen orange juice concentrate or other fruit juices. It's delicious and power-packed with nutrients and vitamins.
- Layer fresh fruit with yogurt and sprinkle it with granola to make a healthy "ice cream" sundae.
- Spread graham crackers, rice cakes or popcorn cakes with peanut butter or honey, and let the children arrange whatever fruit or toppings they'd like.
- Try spreading cream cheese or peanut butter in a tortilla, add grated carrot, lettuce or other vegetables, and roll it up. Children love these wraps.
- Make a quickie pizza out of bagel halves, English muffins or pita bread. Spread it with pizza or spaghetti sauce and top with grated cheese. Broil or microwave until the cheese melts.
- Use low-fat yogurts and puddings. Mix canned fruit cocktail into vanilla pudding or freeze the yogurt in the container for a cool treat.

QUICK CHOCOLATE FONDUE

For the times when you want to really treat the children with something sweet.
Use fresh strawberries or slices of orange, apple and banana or other fruit as dippers.

12-oz. package semisweet chocolate chips
2 tbsp. butter
¼ cup orange juice

Combine the chips, butter and orange juice in a large microwave-safe bowl. Cover with wax paper and heat in the microwave on high for 1 minute. Stir until the mixture is smooth. Heat for another minute if necessary or until any chunks are melted. Set in the centre of a table and use skewers or forks for dipping the fruit into the chocolate.

CHEESE AND OLIVE PIZZA

For each pizza:
1 slice bread
4 green or black olives, halved
1-2 slices cheese

Place olive halves on bread and cover with cheese. Broil or cook in microwave just until cheese is melted.

VEGGIE-WICH

2 cups frozen mixed vegetables
1 tbsp. mayonnaise
3 slivers dill pickle
½ cup shredded lettuce
2 slices avocado, optional dash of seasoned salt
1 pita

Cook vegetables for about 5 minutes in the microwave. Heat pita to soften and cut a sliver from the top so that the pocket opens easily. Combine all ingredients, mix well and stuff into pocket.

APPLE BAKE

1 apple
2 tbsp. raisins
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. sugar
½ cup apple juice

Cut apples in small slices. Place in a bowl. Put raisins, cinnamon, sugar and apple juice on top of sliced apple. Microwave for 1-2 minutes.

Kashruth Council launches Web site

The Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) has a new Web site.

For more than 50 years, the non-profit Kashruth Council of Canada – now at www.cor.ca – has provided supervision and certification on kosher products, worked to ensure the availability and identification of kosher products and services and provided information on kashrut. It is the largest organization of its kind in Canada and is recognized by its trademark COR.

"In our large cities of today, news about the availability of new kosher products and services or the withdrawal of supervision travels slowly," says the council's chair Marvin Sigler.

"Through the publication of our Web site, we now have the ability to deliver to the community, in real time, the information needed to stay informed and keep kosher."

Sigler says the site will provide people with "up-to-the-minute information on, for example, what brands of the same products are kosher or what kosher restaurants are available in your part of the city and how to get there."

It also has a retail consumers' product guide, commercial product listings, kashrut alerts, frequently asked questions, information on kosher fish and the preparation of vegetables, holiday information and recipes.

Along with COR's mission statement, the site includes information on board members, staff and links to other kashrut organizations, establishments and services in Toronto.

Sigler says food companies will have the ability to search for substitute ingredients if the usual ingredient is out of stock or if they are processing new products.

"We are very proud of our large team of rabbis and supervisors who work closely with more than 800 companies and numerous local establishments – caterers, restaurants, institutions, camps and others – to ensure that the products found on store shelves and the many services we supervise meet the highest standards of kashrut and the kashrut needs of the consumer," says Rabbi Mordechai Levin, the council's executive director.

Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, chair of the Vaad Hakashruth of Toronto, which is part of the council, says, "As food items and raw materials are being imported and exported to the four corners of the globe, there is an urgent need to have up-to-date information."

For those who do not have access to the Web site, the council will continue to distribute mailings throughout the year. Thousands of homes in Canada and internationally receive these mailings which include the Kashruth Directory, frequent updates, holiday information, recipes and other information.

If you wish to be on COR's mailing list, call 416-635- 9550 or write to the Kashruth Council of Canada, 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Toronto, Ont., M2R 3V2.

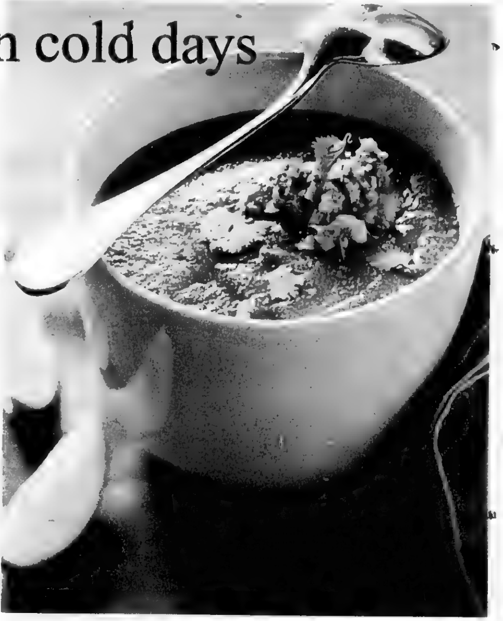
Beef-based soup:a comfort food on cold days



By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

My quick fix comfort food when I'm cold is a huge, hearty bowl of a beef-based soup. The following recipes are designed to use the minimum amount of meat to give you the maximum amount of flavour. These soups make a nice change from chicken soup, and all can be prepared on Friday and be ready for lunch on Shabbat.

CROCK POT VEGETABLE SOUP

2 medium potatoes, peeled and diced
2 medium carrots, peeled and diced
1½ to 2 lbs. beef shank bones with meat
1 medium onion, peeled and chopped
1 can whole tomatoes (16 oz.), quartered and chopped
1 can whole corn (17 oz.), undrained
1 bay leaf
1 tbsp. dried parsley flakes
1 tsp. soy sauce
½ tsp. dried thyme leaves
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
¼ tsp. ground savory
2 tsp. instant beef bouillon
3 cups boiling water

Place the first 7 ingredients in a crock pot in the order listed. Sprinkle parsley and the next 5 ingredients over the vegetables. Dissolve bouillon in boiling water and pour over spices. Cover and cook on low setting for 8 to 10 hours.

Remove beef shank and bay leaf and cover again. Remove meat from bones and cut into bite-size pieces. Return meat to soup and stir. Heat and serve.

This can be made in a regular stock pot and cooked on a stove top at low boil for 2 to 3 hours. Makes 3 quarts. Serves 8 to 10.

WILD MUSHROOM BEEF BARLEY SOUP

½ cup dried wild mushrooms (you can use portobellos instead. You just dice about a cup and delete the 1 cup of boiling water)
1 cup boiling water for dried mushrooms
2 to 3 lbs. short ribs
1 medium leek or 1 medium onion
2 stalks celery, diced finely
1½ cups pearl barley
1 large carrot, peeled and diced finely salt and pepper, to taste
oil to sauté the veggies fresh chopped parsley (optional)
8 cups water

In a bowl, soften the mushrooms by pouring 1 cup of boiling water over them and letting them soak for about 10 minutes. Drain the mushrooms but save the liquid. Strain if necessary. Set aside.

In a skillet, brown the soup bone on both sides in a tiny bit of oil. Drain on a paper towel and set aside.

Cut off the dark green parts of the leek and use only white and light green parts. Slice the leek in half lengthwise and wash very carefully in between the leaves. Dry with paper towel. Chop the leek finely. (You can substitute onion for the leek.) Put a bit of oil in a skillet (use the one in which you browned the short ribs), add the diced veggies and sauté on medium heat until the vegetables are fragrant and the leeks are translucent, about 10 minutes.

Put everything in the slow cooker. Add the pearl barley and the seasonings. Pour 8 cups of water (including the saved mushroom soaking liquid) over everything, cover, set on high, and cook until the meat is just falling off the bone, about 4 hours. Discard the bone. Dice the meat and put it back in the soup. Adjust seasoning if needed. You can make this on the stovetop. Serves 8.

BEEF NOODLE SOUP

1 pound cubed beef stew meat
1 cup chopped carrots
1 cup chopped onion
1 cup chopped celery
¼ cup beef bouillon granules
¼ tsp. dried parsley
5¾ cups water
pinch ground black pepper
2½ cups frozen egg noodles

In a large saucepan over medium-high heat, sauté the stew meat, onion and celery for 5 minutes, or until meat is browned on all sides. Stir in the bouillon, parsley, ground black pepper, carrots, water and egg noodles. Bring to a boil, reduce heat to low and simmer for 30 minutes. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

BEEFY TOMATO SOUP

2 pounds ground beef
1 onion, chopped
2 stalks celery, chopped
1 tsp. minced garlic
1 can (14½ oz.) diced tomatoes with Italian seasonings
½ tsp. dried oregano
2 cups water
4 cups tomato juice
salt and pepper to taste

Place beef, onion, garlic, celery and diced tomatoes in a stock pot. Add water, bring to a boil and then simmer for 1 hour. Add tomato-vegetable juice, tomato juice, oregano and garlic powder, and season with salt and pepper. Bring to boil, simmer for 1½ hours and serve. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Putin expresses concern over Mideast violence, pledges help

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

MOSCOW — Russian President Vladimir Putin told Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that Moscow is concerned about the level of violence in the Middle East, and pledged that he would do all he could to end the bloodshed.

The two met at the Kremlin on Monday for their third round of talks in Moscow since Sharon took office almost three years ago. Among the topics for discussion were the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and Iran's nuclear arms program.

"We follow closely how our former countrymen settle down and go about their lives in Israel, and the worsening of the situation in the Middle East gives us certain concern about their future," Putin said, referring to Israelis from the former Soviet Union, who make up about one-sixth of the population.

"This, among other things, is the reason why we are ready to go on taking an active part, as far as this is possible, in finding a settlement to the situation in the Middle East."

Before the talks, Sharon said captured Lebanese militants Mustafa Dirani and Abdul Karim Obeid will not be used as bargaining chips in any deal involving missing Israel Air Force navigator Ron Arad, Army Radio reported.

"Israel is making every effort to free Ron Arad, but the Lebanese detainees Dirani and Obeid cannot be used as bargaining chips for his exchange," he said.

Sharon said that at the centre of any prisoner exchange deal is the question of whether to leave abducted Israeli Elhanan Tannenbaum in the hands of Lebanese militant group Hezbollah, in the knowledge that his life is in danger.

The family of Ron Arad, who has not been seen since he bailed out his plane over Lebanon in 1986, have argued against the inclusion of Dirani in any deal for Tannenbaum, claiming that Dirani was captured for use as a bargaining chip for the missing navigator.

Sources close to the Sharon delegation on the trip described the expected talks as routine.

Sharon was to raise with Putin the necessity of halting Iran's nuclear program and of ensuring that Tehran's last declaration agreeing to allow international inspectors to visit its nuclear installations will be followed through.

The head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, Hassan Rohani, cancelled his trip to Moscow, the Iranian embassy in Russia said Monday. Rohani was due to arrive in Moscow that day.

Russian companies are involved in the installation of nuclear power stations in Iran near the city of Bushar. The stations were originally to be up and running by the end of this year, but Moscow recently announced that the project had been delayed.

At their meeting, Sharon planned to tell Putin that he intends to renew negotiations with the Palestinians, and he wanted to convince the Russian president not to submit a resolution to the UN Security Council to have it adopt the road map peace plan.

Sources close to the prime minister said if the UN adopted the road map, it would be much harder to progress with the peace talks.

The sources expressed concern over Putin's comments a few weeks ago when he implied criticism of Israel's reactions to Palestinian terror attacks. Sharon was expected to tell Putin that there is no differentiating terror.

Sharon started his visit to Russia Sunday with a visit to a dairy farm just outside the capital. He watched a calf being born and visited a Russian milking centre.

He met Sunday night with parents of Jewish youths who have immigrated to Israel as part of organized programs such as Na'aleh for high school students, and Selah for university students, as well as parents of soldiers serving in the Israel Defence Forces.

Sharon told the parents about his meeting with their children during the recent Sukkot holiday. "They had no grumbles," he said, "no complaints. They just wanted to contribute more."

Sharon, who is accompanied by Immigration Minister Tzipi Livni and Russian-born Transportation Minister Avigdor Lieberman, was also scheduled to meet with leaders of the Russian Jewish community.

Professors concerned by Israel study restrictions

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Universities are discouraging North Americans from studying in Israel, the presidents of three major American Jewish studies groups say.

"Over the past three years, the sharp decline in the number of North American undergraduate students in 'study abroad' programs at Israeli universities has had a severe and deleterious impact on academic Jewish studies programs in the United States and Canada," the presidents of the American Academy for Jewish Research, Association for Jewish Studies and National Association of Professors of Hebrew said in a statement.

"We wish to express our alarm at the policies of North American universities that serve to dissuade, discourage, prevent or even prohibit students who decide to study in Israel from doing so," they wrote. They called on universities to remove obstacles and penalties that obstruct Israel study.

Some universities halted their study-in-Israel programs after the U.S. State Department issued a travel advisory for the Jewish state in 2000 because of the Palestinian intifadah.

In Toronto, there are "no roadblocks" for York University students who wish to study in Israel, said Martin Lockshin, director of the university's Centre for Jewish Studies. Currently, he said, there are about a dozen York students in programs at Tel Aviv University and Hebrew University.

The University of Toronto takes its cue from travel warnings issued by Canada's foreign affairs department, said David Farrar, vice-provost for students. "We follow their recommendations with respect to travel abroad."

The most recent Canadian consular affairs travel report, valid as of last week, advised Canadians to "carefully consider a decision to travel to Israel, paying particular attention to current safety and security conditions." It recommended avoiding crowds and possible targets including malls, markets, restaurants, discotheques, public buses and bus stations. It also advised against travelling to the West Bank or Gaza because of ongoing violence.

If undergraduate students want to go to Israel even if they are specifically advised not to, there's nothing to stop them from taking a year off, studying in Israel, and applying for a transfer credit on their return, Farrar said. "If we say we'll give you a transfer credit [in advance], we accept liability… We have a responsibility to ensure that our students are as safe as possible."

Graduate students, he noted, "accept risk at a different level."

A U of T endowment fund established in 1999 by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, with matching funds from the Ontario government, has been used for both graduate and undergraduate exchanges, Farrar said.

"If there was a warning, we wouldn't send students right now. Funding would be held back until the advisory was lifted, or it would be diverted to graduate students," he said.

A U of T half-credit mini-course in management and resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict, for graduate students, is scheduled for the winter break at Hebrew U. As of last week, there were 19 interested students said Merle Goldman, the director of national programs and academic affairs for Canadian Friends of Hebrew U.

There are no U of T undergraduates studying at Hebrew U now, but that has nothing to do with U of T policy, said Goldman. "Nobody has been denied anything that I'm aware of."

Zimbabwe Jews rebound from fire

By MOIRA SCHNEIDER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CAPE TOWN — Anti-Semitism doesn't appear to have played a factor in the burning of a Zimbabwean synagogue the day before Yom Kippur, but the same can't be said for a letter that followed the blaze.

Barely a week after the Oct. 4 fire, which completely destroyed the 90-year-old landmark in the city of Bulawayo except for its foyer and facade, a controversial letter written under the pseudonym "Busybody" appeared in the Bulawayo Chronicle.

In it, the writer asked "what really was in the Jewish church" that day, opining that it was not "just a beautiful carpet that went up in smoke. A normal church building would have nothing except the alter [sic], a few effigies of Jesus and perhaps the church library and furniture, but not this one, it seems."

One theory, the author wrote, was that "church members" were keeping foreign currency and millions of dollars in local currency there to "cushion themselves against the cash shortages" that Zimbabwe is experiencing.

The writer also said synagogue members were keeping their passports there, as well as "Jewish mementoes" that they intended on "repatriating" to Jerusalem and archives that were "guarded by the Israeli army day and night."

And then the writer delivered his coup de grace.

"Several, and so 'Busybody' understands, had found a 'safe' place to keep their hoarded fuel," at a time when Zimbabwe is suffering from food and fuel shortages, with people lining up for days at gas stations. "Sources say it was that fuel that might have triggered the fire."

Former Bulawayo resident Abe Abrahamson said Jews who congregated at the site of the destroyed synagogue on the day of the fire wept and recited Kaddish.

In the letter, the writer latched onto this fact in support of his theory, saying that whatever was being kept there must have been "very big, judging by the amount of emotion, dejection and desperation on the faces of the victims that fateful Saturday."

Alan Feigenbaum, president of the 110-year-old Bulawayo Hebrew Congregation – the country's oldest synagogue and, in its heyday, the largest in Zimbabwe – said that despite the publication of the letter and the anti-white sentiment rampant in the country, the community does not feel threatened as Jews.

"We are not having any real major problems in that way," he said.

He said the community had been devastated by the fire, "but we'll carry on and see how to reorganize our lives, and we will have services on a regular basis."

Despite the dwindling number of Jews in the country – down to 600 from a peak of 8,500 in the 1960s – the community had engaged a rabbi from Israel in time for the High Holy Days.

The Jewish exodus has come amid a time of turbulence and upheaval in Zimbabwe, which is ruled by the mercurial Robert Mugabe.

Over the past several years, black "war veterans" have invaded white-owned farms across the country and turned out their owners. Hundreds of thousands of black farm workers and their families have also been thrown out of their homes.

The country's economy has deteriorated into massive unemployment and runaway inflation, and more than 80 per cent of the black population now lives below the poverty line. A longstanding drought has exacerbated the risk of hunger.

For now, the 159-strong Bulawayo congregation is holding services in the Sinai Jewish Community Center, using prayer books and prayer shawls sent from communities in Cape Town and Johannesburg – some of which arrived in time for Yom Kippur services the day after the fire.

"They are coping very well and are quite satisfied with using the Sinai for their immediate needs. From there, I don't know," Feigenbaum said.

Ignoring the warnings of firefighters, congregants Rodney Lepar and Raymond Roth braved the flames and managed to save all the Torah scrolls, as well as a 350-year-old curtain that covers the Aron Kodesh.

Lepar, 51, who has lived in Bulawayo all his life, said he too had been devastated by the fire.

"Part of our lives and our history has just gone. The wonderful memories are there, though," he said. "I was heart-sore to see the shul go up in smoke."

In a poignant twist, Leizer Abrahamson, 104, recited from the Torah – as he does at most services – at what proved to be the last service held at the shul.

EU poll: Israel a threat

When Shalom was asked about the Simon Wiesenthal Center's call to throw the EU out of the Quartet of Middle East peace brokers – the other three members of the Quartet are the United States, Russia and the United Nations – he said, "I don't want to clash with this or that institute, but I don't see things the extreme way they do.

"One need not dramatize every poll and there's no need for bile."

He said the survey could also be viewed as the result of decades of Israeli neglect of the European arena, whereas the Palestinians have invested much effort in Europe.

But Shalom emphasized that Europe is "not a lost cause," citing a number of recent Israeli accomplishments: the inclusion of the political wing of the Hamas on the EU terrorist list; the signing with the EU of research and development and agricultural agreements that were delayed for more than two years; and the EU foiling of a Palestinian initiative to send the separation fence to the international court at the Hague.

Shalom said he is not deluding himself. "Of course, there are disputes that cannot be ignored."

Nevertheless, he is convinced that Israel's investment in the continent is worthwhile – and that its position will improve on May 1, 2004, when the EU is set to be joined by 10 central and eastern European countries, who have more balanced positions on the Middle East conflict.

Important Notice to Holocaust Survivors and Their Heirs

Claims Filing Deadline Extended to December 31, 2003

If you are a Holocaust survivor or the heir of a Holocaust victim, you may have a legitimate unpaid Holocaust era insurance claim.

You can file a claim through a Claims Resolution Process set up by the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC). The commission consists of representatives of United States insurance regulators, five European insurance companies and their subsidiaries, the State of Israel, worldwide Jewish and Holocaust survivor organizations and European regulators as Observers.

ICHEIC has managed an extensive research effort to identify potential policyholders. In total, over 470.000 names have been published representing more than 500.000 insurance policies . The list will be updated with new names in the coming weeks. However, these lists are unlikely to include all the names of Holocaust victims who had insurance policies during the relevant period. People should not be discouraged from filing claims simply because their name or the names of family members do not appear on any published lists. Anyone who believes he or she has a valid life, education or dowry policy is encouraged to present the claim to ICHEIC.

The opportunity exists for you to receive payment if you submit a claim before DECEMBER 31,2003.

The Claims Resolution Process is a free service that provides individuals with a central source for information on, investigation into, and payment of these outstanding policies. If you or someone you know may be eligible visit the website www.icheic.org or call:

Wolfowitz supports 'People's Voice' plan

By ALUF BENN and SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. Deputy Secretary of Defence Paul Wolfowitz expressed his support last Thursday for the "People's Voice" initiative drawn up by former Shin Bet chief Ami Ayalon and Al-Quds University president Sari Nusseibeh.

The two presented Wolfowitz with the main principles of the plan during a meeting in Washington two weeks ago.

Wolfowitz said the proposal was very similar in nature to the internationally brokered road map peace plan, which envisioned a two-state solution by 2005.

According to the People's Voice Web site, some 94,000 Israelis and 60,000 Palestinians have signed up for the plan, which also calls for a two-state solution, as well as an end to the Palestinian right of return to lands within the State of Israel.

During a lecture at Georgetown University in Washington, Wolfowitz said that achieving peace between Israel and the Palestinians was important in order to encourage moderate elements in the Middle East. He praised Ayalon and Nusseibeh's initiative, calling it a significant public movement.

Change could come from the bottom up, Wolfowitz said, adding there would be significant progress in Middle East peace talks if Israelis and Palestinians showed wide support for compromise and resistance to terror, which he said was the main obstacle to regional peace.

In his lecture, Wolfowitz lauded the leaders who brought peace between Israel and Egypt, mentioning Egypt's Anwar Sadat, Jordan's King Hussein and Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres.

Wolfowitz, the most senior Jewish official in the Bush administration's diplomatic-security staff, is considered to be the most prominent speaker of the neo-conservative group in the Republican Party, and the ideologue behind the Iraq war.

Meanwhile, British Prime Minister Tony Blair last Thursday lauded the "Geneva Agreement," saying an unofficial plan for Middle East peace that has been dismissed by the Israeli government was a welcome contribution to the debate over the region's future.

The plan, which has been widely criticized in Israel for going against government policies, has been penned by academics, opposition left-wing Israeli politicians and senior Palestinian political figures, and is due to be signed in Switzerland in coming weeks.

It is separate from the U.S.-backed road map peace plan, which has been derailed by persistent violence. The Palestinians and Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon back the road map, albeit with reservations on the Israeli side.

Blair, who was asked about the initiative at a news conference two weeks ago, said last Thursday such a contribution to the stalled peace process was not counterproductive.

"At this time, both people need hope. This initiative gives them a chance to look beyond current difficulties to what might be achievable with goodwill on both sides," Blair said.

"I hope that the initiative will stimulate debate, remind people of why peace is worth working for, show that Israelis and Palestinians remain capable of finding partners for peace and working together, and encourage them back to the negotiating table."

But, he added, "Tackling security remains the essential first step towards this or any other settlement."

The Israeli cabinet has called it a "virtual agreement" and accused the opposition group behind it of harming Israeli national interests.

Pakistan debates the idea of recognizing Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

"Pakistan is not our enemy," Shimon Peres, Israel's opposition leader, declared recently, urging the Pakistani government to hold an open discussion on forming diplomatic relations with Israel.

Peres made these comments after Pakistan's president, Pervez Musharraf, asked his fellow Pakistanis to consider the notion of recognizing Israel. Yet in courageously calling for this move, Musharraf cautioned, "We have to develop a national consensus before action on this can be taken."

Shortly afterward, the secretary of Pakistan's National Security Council and Musharraf's right-hand aide, Tariq Aziz, observed that Pakistan is prepared to accept "the reality of Israel."

Always ready to forge ties with Muslim states, Israel welcomed Pakistan's overture. As Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom put it, "Israel regards favourably the possibility of setting up relations with an important Muslim state."

Pakistan is certainly a pivotal state. It is the only Muslim country with a nuclear arsenal, and the United States considers Pakistan – the country where American Jewish journalist Daniel Pearl was brutally murdered – an ally in the war against international terrorism.

If Israel succeeds in forging official links with Pakistan, would populous Muslim nations such as Indonesia, and Bangladesh be far behind?

Judging by Musharraf's recent remarks, Pakistani decision-makers have entered into a fairly serious debate over the advisability of a rapprochement with Israel. There is a growing perception in Pakistan, particularly in the armed forces, that its hostility to the Jewish state has pushed India, its arch enemy, even closer to Israel.

Two months ago, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon paid a state visit to India, the first by a sitting Israeli leader. "This is a historic visit," said Indian Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee, voicing confidence it would boost India's military and commercial ties with Israel.

Having upgraded relations with India across the board in the past few years, Israel is now India's second largest arms supplier after Russia.

In a $1-billion (US) deal announced last month, India agreed to buy Phalcon radar-warning aircraft from Israel.

Stung by the transaction, Pakistan's information minister warned it could upset the conventional military balance in the region.

And in a commentary reflecting Pakistani jitters over Sharon's presence in India, the Pakistan Daily Times noted, "The Foreign Office in Islamabad is greatly upset… because it might be aimed at creating an axis against the Muslim world, and Pakistan."

The fear that India may grow still stronger, due to its strategic relationship with Israel, is not the only factor at work here.

Some members of the Pakistani elite believe that Pakistan would increase its influence in the West, especially in the United States, through diplomatic relations with Israel.

Compelling though these arguments may be, the prospect that Pakistan will soon establish ties with Israel is highly unlikely.

Pakistan, whose foreign policy is based on Islamic solidarity, close friendship with the Arab world and unconditional support for the Palestinian cause, will probably not cozy up to Israel until the Arab-Israeli conflict is resolved.

The idea of Pakistani relations with Israel is an extremely sensitive subject in Pakistan, especially in conservative Muslim religious circles. As Mohmmed Ashraf Chaudhry put it in Pakistan Link, a Web site, "One cannot talk about sex and Israel, even academically, in Pakistan, though both are an undeniable reality… If the Palestinians have no problems in negotiating with Israel, why should Pakistan have any?"

Pakistan's former foreign minister, Tanvir Ahmed Khan, is of the view that Pakistan should maintain covert contacts with Israel.

In fact, Israel and Pakistan have maintained a quiet dialogue for many years.

Pakistani leaders, from Ayub Khan and Zia al-Haq to Zulfikar Ali Bhutto and Nawaz Sharif, have consistently supported such contacts, as scholar P.R. Kumaraswamy has written.

But one one should not assume that Pakistan is on the cusp of establishing relations with Israel.

NEW, NEWS, NEWS

Makeup – Classic red lips are timeless and making quite a statement this holiday season, says Jody Daye, makeup artist/designer for L'Oreal Paris. I interviewed Daye behind the runways of Toronto's Fashion Week.

Daye is acclaimed for doing the makeup for Canadian Idol and frequents the sets of international shows that we often see on Fashion Television. He filled my ears with the juiciest tidbits so that I could bring you gals the hottest tips for the season. He said the winter months will see a return to glamour – like old Hollywood.

"The most defining features will be red lips and long, luscious lashes. Use L'Oreal's double-extend mascara and be sure to apply the primer first for the best volume. Keep combing the product through for an extended effect that resembles false lashes." Daye advised.

I mentioned to him that in some of our precious, young years, intense red-coloured lips might be too harsh. He suggested that a full colouring of red lip pencil topped up with Glam Shine from L'Oreal Paris will plump up the lips (in appearance only) and the technique will tone down the colour and keep it flattering.

SpaMedica announces the introduction of a new radio frequency energy to their laser hair removal program. This new energy source attacks the hair follicles, regardless of the colour of the hair. It is a high-frequency electrical current, like pulse electrolysis, and is combined with more traditional laser energy in the same pulse.

"What this means to our patients is that now red, gray and blond hair patients can enjoy the potential benefits of permanent hair reduction" says Dr. Stephen Mulholland, owner and director of SpaMedica.

The treatment requires five visits of five to 45 minutes once a month. It is relatively pain-reduced with SpaMedica using a topical anesthetic cream and topical chiller. Return to work is almost immediate and the results are 50 to 75 per cent permanent hair reduction after the five treatments. Another terrific beautifying enhancement from SpaMedica!

Chanel's Sparkling LipGloss in its little square tray is overlaid with four swirling silver spirals. The lilac colour contains silver and blue glitter particles for a dazzling effect. Chanel's Infrarouge gets into the holiday mood with two new shades, Tulle, pinky beige, copper-tinged rosewood, and Taffetas for iridescent colour.

Sisley introduces glossy gloss Cristal providing great shine with a crystal sparkle- available in six new shades at Holt Renfrew.

Clinique's Stay the Day Lipcolor combines a transfer-resistant colour base-coat with a cushiony, comfortable, super-shine topcoat. This fabulous little treasure comes in a dual-ended package.

NAILS: Estée Lauder's Pure Color Crystal nail lacquer in Frosty Blast is a gorgeous pearly white that is great on its own or to top up your favourite red.

Chanel's new delicate shade Tulle is a soft pinky beige for a real feminine feel.

Get your nails noticed with Clinique's Gloss Wear nail enamel from their Shine, Shine, Shine Collection. Shimmer your nails in gold or silver, or top up your favourite colour!

HAIR: Big news! The Terry Ritcey Salon has a new name: The Wellstone Salon – fabulous isn't it?

Rene Crepeau, stylist supreme, says the buzz in town is all about the Chi Hair Transformation System that is the opposite of a curly perm. It's a straightening process that is permanent – of course, that means until you hair grows out.

Escada's new fragrance enhances the natural 'magnetism' of every woman.

Imagine no more frizzies, just sleek shiny straight hair – all the time. Great Length Extensions are also very popular, Crepeau says. Both treatments are good for men and women.

Laura Marshal, another talented stylist, says the majority of her work involves straightening hair, either with the system or flat ironing.

"It's really quite amazing how straight the hair becomes – zero volume with plenty of shine." Marshal says products like Kerastase's Oleo Relax Nutri-Huille is a great way to supplement the hair's natural shine during this process.

Crepeau and Marshal say this method looks best on cuts just past the shoulder. Cuts are full of long, slightly choppy layers, topped with blunt cut bangs – very '60s mod, they add.

Fight the effects of time with Age Recharge from Kerastase Paris. This is a firming mask for lifeless, fine and brittle hair. Escada unveils a captivating perfume that enhances the natural magnetism of every woman. Its name – Magnetism. It's a contemporary, gourmand oriental, housed in a gem-like bottle that's stunning.

Still perfume is a bouquet of floral, honeysuckle and musk, yet another offering from Jennifer Lopez. The bottle is jewelled with a stunning solitaire ring.

Holt Renfrew launches a complete and new men's line – Aramis Life. It's a fragrance of intriguing and unexpected contrasts inspired by Andre Agassi.

Dunhill introduces its first signature fragrance since 1934. Lemon fuses together with geranium, with highlights of woody tones and musk – a very cool and masculine scent. It's available at Holt Renfrew and all Dunhill boutiques.

The world of fashion… from the inside

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Since fashion seeps into every aspect of our lives, from the magazines we read to the movies we watch, it is impossible not to be utterly fascinated by the way it works.

For those of you who were wondering, the fashion industry is every bit as fabulous and fierce as you might imagine.

Since September of this year, I've been studying fashion at Ryerson University. In the past two months, I've been privy to a firsthand look at what the biz is really all about.

So far, the most important thing I've learned is that climbing the ranks has a lot to do with your social skills. In this industry, no one will ever know how talented you are unless you're obnoxious enough to let 'em know!

In September, I volunteered at Toronto Fashion Week. I was a dresser at two of the week's bigger shows: Arthur Mendonca and David Dixon. The experience was absolutely amazing because I was right in the middle of all the excitement. From my dispensing advice to designers to helping models in and out of stunning dresses, I was constantly on the move.

After the show, I was chutzpahdik enough to give the designers a makeshift business card. A few weeks later, I got a call from a stylist inviting me to another show. This time it was for Fashion Television.

This show was equally exciting. With some other fashion students, I spent the majority of time fawning over Prada and Miu Miu frocks. It was a fashion lover's paradise.

During the Toronto Film Festival, Holt Renfrew and Vanity Fair threw the bash of the week. A group of us at Ryerson had the chance to be part of it. We hobnobbed with the rich and famous – everyone from Kim Cattral and Hillary Duff to Roberto Cavalli. For the first time in my life, I got to go past a red rope! My name was on a security list!

But perhaps my most special experience so far has been meeting Zac Posen, an absolutely brilliant young designer from New York. While he was making a special appearance at Holt Renfrew, I got the chance to have a private chat with him. We talked about everything from the industry to Goodwill finds. He even complimented me on my shoes!

Well, that's it for this report. I'll keep you posted on more fashion happenings… stay tuned!

New outlet for Zero-20 Bambini

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

After 20 years of dressing Toronto's junior set in the world's finest fashions and craftsmanship, Zero-20 will now provide parents with another outlet to satisfy their search for stylish, affordable children's clothing.

The newest fashion outlet, 020, is a designer outlet for their extensive line of European, American and domestic quality clothes.

Santina Mariani began the business with her sister, Anna Turrin, 20 years ago, selling from babies' size 0 to size 20 preteens.

Mariani explains the reasoning behind opening the new outlet. "At the end of every season, everything goes on sale and then we don't have the space to keep our sale merchandise around."

People often come into the store weeks after they saw something on the rack, she says, seeking it in the same style or from a certain line. But because of space restrictions, the merchandise is not longer available. French and Italian goods come in early, and after a few months, they are sent out for storage.

At the outlet, the rent is not as high, and there is a lot of space, Mariani says. So instead of putting the items into storage, she can move them to the outlet, where they will be sold at the same price or lower.

Merchandise may be 30 per cent to 70 per cent less than retail prices. New merchandise available from their suppliers will also be displayed with the sale merchandise, and suppliers' samples will be offered at a good price, with special sample nights.

The outlet will be based on a different premise, Mariani says. "The concept at our store is that we buy completely new everything. We are a top-notch boutique."

A quick browse through the store takes in luscious sweaters by Diesel, printed velvet and faux suede, winter jackets with faux fur trim in vibrant greens, soft creams and muted magentas. Dresses with lace ribbons have pretty crinolines peeking out underneath.

Formal dresses in peau de soie with beading, floral appliqués or sparkling accents are reminiscent of Pucci prints, and Miniman jacquard rose-printed outfits come with coordinating tights. Box skirts can be styled in a pared-down mini, flared at the knee or ankle-length.

"I see dressing up as starting to come back," Mariani says. "People are tired of always looking the same. People want to see fresh, better clothing. I think there's a resurgence of people wanting better quality and more fashionable things."

Her clientele clearly appreciate more than just the calibre of the clothing. The staff are courteous and helpful and seamstresses are available to do any alterations.

"The more you treat [people] with respect and honesty, the more loyal they become," Mariani says.

Anything!

inspired by Gemarah Kiddushin 31a

Dama ben Nesina shifted uncomfortably on the exquisite couch. No, it wasn't the couch that was uncomfortable. It was the knowledge that soon all the people he had borrowed from would come demanding payment, and take away the exquisite couch. And the luxurious tapestries. And his collection of rare precious stones. And his whole castle. Pretty soon, the great Dama ben Nesina would be a pauper begging in the streets. He shifted uncomfortably again.

"My Lord Dama!"

Dama looked up at the servant standing in the doorway.

"Two men are here to see you."

Dama's heart dropped. His creditors had come. "Thaddeus and Brutus?" he asked, cringing at the inevitable answer.

"No, two rabbis."

Dama leapt up, relieved... and confused. Why do two rabbis want to see me, he wondered. I'm not even Jewish!

He hastened down the marble hallway to greet his distinguished visitors.

"Good morning, Rabbis. To what do I owe the honour of this visit?"

The Rabbis spoke politely, but hurriedly. They were obviously in a great rush. "We urgently need a yashfe [jasper] stone. We have heard you have one. We're willing to pay anything for it. ANYTHING."

Dama's heard leapt. This could be his chance to escape ruin. "Anything? What do you mean?"

"Make us an offer."

"Twelve million," said Dama, knowing they would refuse such an outrageously high price.

"Twelve million? It's a deal. Please get it now, the faster the better."

"Please, come with me," said Dama, stunned at his unexpected good fortune. "My treasure house is at the other end of the castle. It will take us about five minutes to walk there. I... hope you don't mind my asking, but why are you so desperate for a yashfe?"

"The High Priest in our Temple may not perform his daily service without his special garments. One of these garments, a breastplate, needs a yashfe stone. Without the stone, he cannot use the garment. Without the garment, he cannot do the service."

"We realize that we could obtain one for a fraction of what we're paying you if only we would wait a few days," interjected the other Rabbi. "But we need this now. We know of only two people in this area who have one: you, and Marcus Claudius. You were closer."

"I see," said Dama, walking faster. "I had been wondering... I realize that you don't usually spend that much on things."

"Right."

"But we would for the para," added the other rabbi.

"You're right, " agreed the first.

"Huh?" said Dama.

"Well, you see, there's a very special service we do which requires the ash of a para aduma, a cow that is totally red. As you can see, a cow like that is very difficult to obtain, and anyone fortunate enough to end up with one could sell it for even more than we're giving you for the yashfe... Speaking of which, are we almost there?"

"We'll be there shortly," replied Dama. "But first, I have to get the key to my treasure house. It's in a room down that corridor. I'm going to get it now. I'll only be a minute."

Dama hastened down the corridor. The key was hidden in an inconspicuous box at the foot of a bed. He just had to take the key, get the stone, give it to the rabbis, and he would be saved. He unlocked the door, swung it open, burst in... and froze. On the bed, with his feet on the box, lay his elderly father. Asleep. All he had to do was take the box out from under his feet. So I'll wake my father up. He won't mind. He'll understand... but it's not right. "Honour thy father and thy mother... except when you stand to lose a fortune..." No, it doesn't work that way. You honour your parents no matter what. Whether it's easy. Or whether it's going to cost you millions.

"I'm... I'm sorry," he told the rabbis. I can't give you the stone now. Maybe you could wait an hour, half an hour..."

"We too are sorry. But we don't have time. We need the stone immediately. We're going to have to go to Marcus Claudius."

Dama escorted them out. He felt like he was going to die...

He lay in abject misery on his exquisite couch. He was going to lose it all, lose everything, for his decision. My father probably would have wanted to be awakened, he chided himself. My father would rather lose a minute of sleep than have his son lose his castle.

But he didn't regret his choice. He still felt he had done the right thing.

"Master!" exclaimed the servant in the doorway. "You must come!"

"What? Are Thaddeus and Brutus here to see me?"

"No! The stable-boy told me I should get you. He says a most amazing cow has been born. A red one. The kind the Jews need for their service! I don't know much about these things myself, but he says they'll pay anything for it. Anything!"

Exodus 20:12
5th Commandment

Toby Belfer discovers her family history at Ellis Island

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

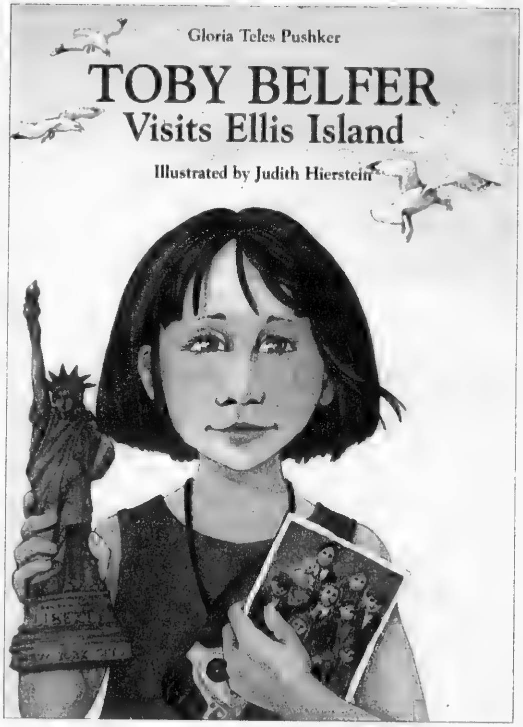
Can you imagine how scary it must have been for our grandparents and great grandparents to come to North America.

They had to leave the places they had lived for generations and come to new countries, with their new customs and a whole new language.

They had to do it, though, in order to do better financially, or, especially for Jews, to escape persecution.

Most immigrants to Canada came through Halifax and a landing place called Pier 21. There is a museum there that you can go see.

In the United States, many people came through Ellis Island, an island in New York Harbour where the Statue of Liberty is. It is a very famous place, and now the whole island is a museum, where you can find out what it was like for immigrants to come there.



Gloria Teles Pushker has written a new book called Toby Belfer Visits Ellis Island (Pelican, 2003), with illustrations by Judith Hierstein. You may have read other books about Toby Belfer, such as Toby Belfer and the High Holy Days, Toby Belfer Never Had a Christmas Tree, and Toby Belfer's Seder.

Toby's grandmother used to tell her stories about how her own grandmother's family came to Ellis Island in 1904 – a very long time ago.

The family had lived in a tiny village in Poland. There was a mother and father and seven children. They were very happy, until some cruel soldiers came to the town, trampled the gardens and burned the synagogue. The soldiers also said that the villagers couldn't follow Jewish laws anymore and that all the boys had to become soldiers.

(This is not an unusual story, by the way – very similar things happened to Jews in many parts of Poland, Russia and Galicia.)

The family packed the few belongings they could carry and left their village. They travelled on a boat with many families from other countries who were also going to find safety and prosperity in the New World.

The book talks about the medical checkups the immigrants had to go through, Some who had contagious diseases, such as tuberculosis, were sent back.

Many had their names changed – one woman in the book became Mrs. Green, because she was wearing a green dress.

When they finally got through all the checks, examinations and questionings, the family took a train to New Orleans, where they opened a hat shop. The older children helped after school.

At the end of the book, Toby and her family go to the museum at Ellis Island. She is excited to see everything there and looks forward to telling her classmates about it.

One important thing about Toby's story, and other stories at Ellis Island, is that the people were not famous or wealthy or special in any particular way. They were ordinary people, like you and me, who found a better life on this side of the ocean.

Dialogue key in planning care for aging parents

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Caring for our aging parents ultimately lands on our own shoulders, says the vice-president of medical services at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"At the end of the day, it is we who provide the care. Those who make the policies can help us, but they cannot replace us," says Michael Gordon, co-author, with Bart Mindszenthy, of Parenting Your Parents: Support Strategies for Meeting the Challenge of Aging in the Family.

Gordon and Mindszenthy, along with John Wright, senior vice-president of Canadian public affairs at polling firm Ipsos-Reid, spoke recently at the 2003 annual Ada Starkman lecture, held at Baycrest Centre.

Mindszenthy, an only child who spends about 25 hours a week taking care of his aging parents' needs, said that caring for parents is a journey of discovery.

"We learn about ourselves and about our relationship with our parents. It tests the fabric of the family, but at the end of the day, we know who is there."

Eldercare is an intense experience that we are not trained for, he said. "When we had our children, we went to pre-natal and parenting classes, and we watched the progression of life.

"Now, we are on the flip side, watching the regression of peoples' lives. Their universe is contracting; we are watching the decay of people we love and there is nothing we can do but help."

Planning ahead is one way to help, Mindszenthy said. "Our parents will age, and we need to map out a course on how to [handle it] best.

"Most people have never planned ahead because it is not comfortable for anyone, but it is necessary to have that conversation while you can do it smart."

The obligation of planning is critical, he said, "yet we studiously avoid it. We must get out of that comfort zone."

With each decision we make, he said, "we should acknowledge that the parent is an active participant in the process. We have to let them feel in charge and in control."

Staying close to health-care providers is essential, he said. "Be there for doctors' appointments and ask, ask, ask. It's important to know what is going on. Do not feel intimidated. [The doctor] is there to help."

Wright, whose 79-year-old mother lives with him and his family, said that parent care is the "latest, greatest challenge for [baby] boomers. We are a nation of ever-greying boomers and it has affected us in every way, from consumer goods to travel to the workplace."

This will present a number of challenges in years to come, he said, "but the largest challenge begins at home. [If families begin a dialogue] as to what plans should be considered for the future, things can work out. It all comes together at some point for most families."

We need more discussion at the family and community levels, Wright said. "If we believe that the government has the answers, then we're wrong."

Gordon said that, in his work, he advises people "not to make themselves crazy. Whatever decision you make is the right one. Once that decision is made, just go with it."

Influenza vaccine a boon to many Canadians

Whether it's food, perfume or medication, what is good for many may be problematic for some. Therefore, Health Canada advises citizens to check with their family physicians before taking flu shots, which are given in the fall to protect people from the harsh winter months when flu can put them out of commission.

Now is the time to consider the pros and cons and make an appointment with your doctor or a CLCS for flu vaccine. Influenza (or flu) is a common illness affecting millions of Canadians every year. An annual flu shot can help prevent the infection, or at least reduce the severity of the illness.

Effects of flu

The average person who gets the flu recovers a week or 10 days after the first symptoms occur. However, those at greatest risk are young children and people over 65, as well as people with medical conditions such as chronic respiratory disease, heart or kidney disease or diabetes. In addition, people with a depressed immune system are especially at risk; for example, individuals with cancer or HIV.

What to do when you get the flu

Drink plenty of water, as well as soup and juice. Try to get as much rest as you can for a week.

How to minimize the risk of catching the flu

The most effective way to minimize your chances of catching influenza is to be vaccinated every fall. The vaccination antibodies work for about four to six months.

People who should consult with a physician about a flu shot are:

- adults and children with chronic heart and lung disease;
- anyone living in a nursing home or chronic care facility;
- people 65 years and over;
- people with chronic conditions such as diabetes, anemia, cancer, immune suppression, HIV or kidney disease;
- children and adolescents on long-term aspirin therapy;
- heath-care workers, other caregivers and household contacts capable of transmitting influenza to at-risk groups.

However, children under six months of age and people who are allergic to eggs or have had an allergic reaction to a previous dose of vaccine should avoid the injections.

Regular handwashing may help reduce the risk, as the virus can be found on surfaces touched by those who have the flu.

What to do when you get the flu

Drink plenty of water, as well as soup and juice. Try to get as much rest as you can for a week.

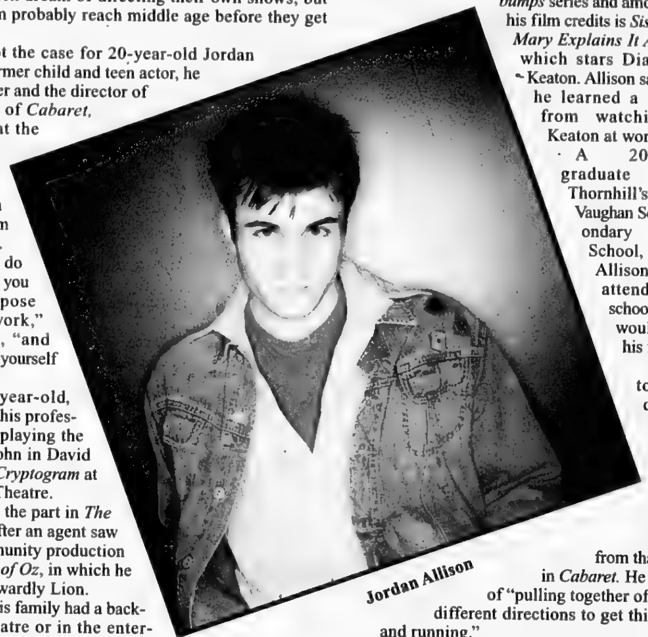
Actors often dream of directing their own shows, but many of them probably reach middle age before they get the chance.

This is not the case for 20-year-old Jordan Allison. A former child and teen actor, he is the producer and the director of a production of Cabaret, which runs at the New Yorker Theatre from Nov. 14 to Dec. 6, with previews from Nov. 10 to 13.



Jordan Allison

"After you do a lot of acting, you want to compose your own work," Allison says, "and speak through yourself as an artist."

As a 12-year-old, Allison made his professional debut, playing the lead role of John in David Mamet's The Cryptogram at the Tarragon Theatre.

Allison got the part in The Cryptogram after an agent saw him in a community production of The Wizard of Oz, in which he played the Cowardly Lion.

No one in his family had a background in theatre or in the entertainment field, he says. "It was just something I wanted to do after school. I had the interest for it."

Allison went on to perform in several musicals, including Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat at the Elgin Theatre and at Leah Posluns Theatre and Bye Bye Birdie at the Orillia Opera House.

His television credits include leading roles in episodes of the Goosebumps series and among his film credits is Sister Mary Explains It All, which stars Diane Keaton. Allison says he learned a lot from watching Keaton at work

A 2001 graduate of Thornhill's Vaughan Secondary School, Allison attended several high schools to find one that would accommodate his flexible schedule.

The opportunity to produce and direct Cabaret came after Allison worked on a production of 42nd Street last year. Some of the actors from that production are in Cabaret. He says it took a lot of "pulling together of resources from different directions to get this production up and running."

Allison says Cabaret, which revolves around Kit Kat Club singer Sally Bowles and an American writer and is set in the late 1920s in Berlin, is two works in one, a play and a musical.

He says that Cabaret is a play without a villain and its strength lies in the situation – "the transition and uprising of the Nazi Party before the Second World War" and how it affects the characters. "You're dealing with a delicate moment in history, and probably one of the most sensitive and emotional topics," he adds.

Cabaret is a play without a villain and its strength lies in the situation – "the transition and uprising of the Nazi Party before the Second World War"

To work on Cabaret, Allison is taking a break from his studies at the University of Toronto, where he's enrolled in the university's drama program and taking courses in architecture and film. When he returns to school, he's considering dropping drama for architecture. Unlike theatre, "it's something I don't know much about," he says.

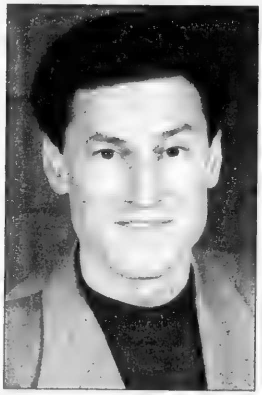
Paikin's new book examines dark side of political life

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN



Steve Paikin

If you want to know about the dark side of politics, ask journalist and author Steve Paikin. He'll tell you about all the backbiting, the struggles, the vendettas and the heartbreak.

Paikin recounts some of these cautionary political tales in The Dark Side: the Personal Price of a Political Life, his just-released second book, published by Penguin Canada.

"I want good people to experience politics. It's a tough business and many naive people get in, then get their hearts broken," he says. "Even then, it's a trip, because even defeated candidates almost never say they'll never run again."

Paikin is well-acquainted with the ups and downs of politics. For the past 10 years, he has fostered political dialogue as the co-host of Studio 2, TVOntario's flagship current affairs show. He also hosts TVO's foreign affairs show, Diplomatic Immunity with Steve Paikin, which debuted in 2000.

Paikin published his first book, The Life: The Seductive Call of Politics, in 2001, with the intention that it and The Dark Side would be companions to one another.

The first book was a surprise bestseller, and he says that as a result, it didn't take much convincing for his publisher to greenlight the second book.

With uncommonly astute insight, Paikin relates many eye-opening anecdotes in his fascinating and detailed tapestry of Canadian politics.

"The stories are dramatic whether you're interested in politics or not," he says.

Writing the book, for which he interviewed 100 people over three years of work, was "the most difficult, time-consuming, exhilarating, rewarding, discipline-requiring thing" he's ever done professional, he says.

Prior to TVO, Paikin worked at radio station CHFI and for CBC Television news. He also produced a documentary on the Holocaust in 1993.

He says that after 10 years tackling politics on Studio 2, he's gotten used to criticism.

"I expect flak from everything I do. That's the nature of being in the current affairs business."

Yet, he adds, "Some of the happiest moments in dealing with feedback come when someone leaves a message on my machine and says, 'You know that job you did tonight? Not only was that so bad I'm going to spend the next two minutes criticizing you, but I'm also going to cancel my TVO membership. I'm so offended by what you did.'"

Often, he says, he'll try to call the person back to at least draw fire away from TVO.

Asked whether his Judaism influences his journalism, and vice versa, he says the journalist in him will examine such things as Israeli government policy more critically than the Jew in him would.

"The Jew in me would tend to be more supportive of Israel, while the journalist in me would temper that," he says. "On the other hand, when Israel is coming under particular condemnation by every single part of the media in the world, the Jew in me perhaps tempers the journalist in me."

Israel treasure hunter seeks Jewish wartime diamonds

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Yaron Svoray, a beefy, theatrical Israeli author and treasure hunter, is at the centre of Blood from a Stone, an intriguing documentary about his obsessive quest for a long-buried cache of diamonds stolen from Jews during the Holocaust.

The film, which chronicles Svoray's investigation from 1988 to 1999, will be broadcast by CBC Newsworld's The Passionate Eye on Sunday, Nov. 9 at 10 p.m., the 65th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

Svoray, who describes himself as a "pushy Israeli," got involved by chance after delivering a lecture at a Bangor, Me. synagogue.

There he met Sam Nyer, a Jewish - American army veteran who, in the last days of World War II, found himself in possession of a trove of French francs, jewelry and 40 uncut diamonds.

He and another soldier, a Mexican - American named Tommy Delion, buried the so-called "rocks" in a foxhole on the French/German border.

There the story ended until Svoray barged into the picture in dramatic fashion.

Svoray, whose last book was about neo-Nazis in Germany, never had any doubts about Nyer's amazing tale. All he had to do was to track down the diamonds, probably worth tens of millions of dollars.

Being in poor health, Nyer could not acompany Svoray on his pursuit. But Svoray, a self-starter, did not really need his assistance. The scent of diamonds was sufficient.

Blood from a Stone, which features dramatizations of Nyer's military service in the Seventh Army, takes the viewer from the glittering diamond centres of New York and Amsterdam to a former death camp in Holland and the killing fields of wartime France.

The rough precious stones in question, "life diamonds," were bought by Jews in Eastern Europe. They intended to use them to restart their lives after the war.

But all too often, they were murdered, and the Nazis pocketed their diamonds.

After a battle in France, Nyer, a scout, grabbed a satchel from a dead German officer. When he and Delion examined its contents, they were dazzled, not knowing the loot had once belonged to Jews.

Neither did they realize there was a kind of "curse" associated with these diamonds.

Blood from a Stone improves as it moves briskly along toward its startling denouement.

Will they actually find the diamonds? And what will they do with the stones if their quest proves successful?

Svoray is a persistent treasure hunter, and these qualities can be admired. But he is also a shameless, somewhat clownish self-promoter.

Nonetheless, Blood from a Stone, which will be spun off as a book, is a documentary worthy of the name.

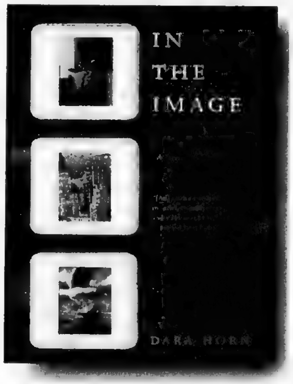
Novelist follows the custom of great Jewish writers

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

New Jersey-born author Dara Horn, 26, whose first novel In The Image has generated a wave of enthusiastic reviews, says one of the stories that inspired her to write the book was a sort of urban myth about Jewish immigrants who, upon reaching America, tossed their tfillin into New York harbour.



She first heard the story from a classmate at Harvard (where she is now completing a PhD thesis in Hebrew and Yiddish literature) and later realized the story was a familiar legend to many elderly American Jews.

But what "clinched it" for Horn, who recently spoke at Israel's bookstore in Toronto, was hearing about "an unidentified museum in Nova Scotia that has an exhibit featuring a set of phylacteries [tfillin] removed from the floor of the Atlantic."

The tfillin-in-the-harbour story is vintage Horn – arcane, peculiar, double-varnished, heavily laden with Jewish symbolism and reflective of a parallel universe where realistic events take on almost magical overtones.

Whether they're about tfillin fished out of New York harbour or a human skull found in a junk shop, many of the tales Horn tells have to do with loss and recovery, she observed.

"They're all about recovering something," she said. "What someone throws away, someone else will bring back."

In The Image focuses on two Jewish characters – Leora, a young American woman, and Bill Landsmann, the Viennese-born grandfather of her lost friend. The book opens with their first meeting, where they infamously fail to hit it off as friends. Subsequent chapters intermittently follow Leora's life forward in time and Bill's life backward in time, highlighting the multiple coincidences of person, place, chronology and event that link these two unlikely ships passing in the night.

"There are all sorts of connections between their two families that they're not aware of," Horn said. "They never do find out – only the reader finds out."

The book is meant to make us aware of "how little we know about other people and how much what you think you know is just your assumption. You can't really know anything about anyone other than what they happen to show you."

Readers may be excused for thinking the novel an appealing intellectual experiment that puts ideas above characters. Horn said she began by collecting stories and ideas that appealed to her, then invented a range of dramatic personae to bring them to life. "I think any serious novel is a novel of ideas," she said.

Following the custom of the great Hebrew and Yiddish writers, whom she regards as mentors, Horn has also woven elements of Jewish sacred literature into her novel, most notably from the Book of Job. Clearly modelled after Job, a chapter of In The Image focuses on the tribulations besetting her ironic hero, Bill Landsmann.

In The Image has become a favourite of Jewish book clubs, so much so that Norton included a 16-page Reading Group Guide at the end of its paperback edition. Yet its author fails a basic thumbnail test of good literature – being able to tell what the book is about in a single breath or while standing on one leg.

She said it may be a "coming-of-age" story about Leora, but quickly added the events could have happened "at any moment in a lifetime."

Still, that hasn't stopped the laudations, fan letters and literary awards from piling up. The book has won three prizes for Jewish fiction, including the $5,000 Reform Judaism Prize and the Edward Lewis Wallant Award, whose previous winners have included Chaim Potok and Cynthia Ozick.

Those honours must have pleased Ruth Wisse, Horn's Canadian-born adviser at Harvard, nearly as much as it did her husband Brendan Schulman, former Winnipeg resident and now a commercial litigation lawyer in New York.

Horn shrugs at the coincidence of having two ex-Canadians so close by. Many more extraordinary coincidences certainly lie waiting in the wings, she insinuates. Some, no doubt, will be the stuff of the second novel she is currently writing for Norton.

AUTHOR ARYEH LEV STOLLMAN, FORMER WINDSOR RESIDENT, SHARES TOP PRIZE WITH J. S. FOER

Aryeh Lev Stollman, formerly of Windsor, Ont., has been named a co-recipient of this year's Harold U. Ribalow award for his second novel, The Illuminated Soul, which tells the story of a young man growing up in a devoutly Jewish home in postwar Ontario.

Aryeh Lev Stollman

The 49-year-old novelist, who works as a neuroradiologist in New York, shares the spotlight with New York author Jonathan Safran Foer, who won for his highly acclaimed first novel, Everything Is Illuminated.

For Stollman, the honour comes only two months after he was named the first winner of the Chaim Potok Literary Award, an annual $10,000 prize established by the Jewish Community Centers of Greater Philadelphia.

Administered by Hadassah magazine, the Ribalow Prize is awarded annually to an author who has created an outstanding work of fiction on a Jewish theme. This year's panel of judges included Elie Wiesel, N. Scott Momaday and Elizabeth Rosner, last year's Ribalow recipient. The awards ceremony takes place in New York on Dec. 2.

The Illuminated Soul explores philosophical questions as it interweaves a man's childhood and adult life with much Jewish lore and mysticism. The story involves an evocative European boarder who lives with the narrator's family in 1940s Windsor and who possesses an illuminated Hebrew manuscript rescued from wartime Prague. One critic has compared Stollman to Bernard Malamud in his gentle reconciliation of religious and scientific themes.

Stollman's first novel, The Far Euphrates (1997), is centred around a Jewish boy, a rabbi's son who grows up in a Canadian border town. His publisher, Riverhead, also recently produced a collection of his short stories, The Dialogues of Time and Entropy.

Foer's novel tells the story of a young Jewish American's journey through eastern Europe to find the woman who might have saved his grandfather during the Holocaust.

New Film Prize: The Toronto Jewish Film Festival, Lillyann Goldstein and @Wallace Studios have established the @Wallace Jewish Film Award. The prize, worth $21,000, is designed to assist Canadian film talent and inspire new works of fiction (comedy or drama), as well as to encourage programming that will increase the number of movies with Jewish content.

The prize will be awarded to a Canadian filmmaker, based on a completed, submitted script that meets the criteria for Jewish content. Chosen by jury, the winner will be announced at the closing of the 12th annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival next May.

The competition is open to all Canadian residents for both short and feature-length film scripts. Deadline is Feb. 1, 2004. www.tjff.com.

Gabi's Dresser on Stage: In preparation for the Canadian premiere next spring, Te-Amim Music Theatre presents school workshop performances of The Secret of Gabi's Dresser, a new play based on the novel by Toronto author Kathy Kacer about actual events that took place during World War II. Rosedale Heights School of the Arts. Free admission; donations will be directed to the Holocaust Memorial Fund. Nov. 4 to 20. Reservations and times, 416-393-1580.

Names in the News: Helene Klodawsky, Ina Fichman and La Fete Productions, mentioned in this column recently as creators of the documentary Undying Love, have garnered a Gemini Award for best history documentary… Montreal stage designer Louise Campeau has won the $100,000 Siminovitch Theatre Prize, the largest annual award of its kind in Canada. The prize is named after scientist Dr. Lou Siminovitch and his late wife Elinore… Director George Bloomfield and writer-producer Alyson Feltes have enticed an impressive array of Canadian talent to join them in The Movie Co-op Inc., a new initiative to produce high-quality commercial feature films. Founding members include Wendy Crewson, Maury Chaykin, Peter Outerbridge, Paul Gross, Eugene Levy, Saul Rubinek, Gordon Pinsent, Bill White, Jane Tattersall and Perry Zimel. Production is slated to begin on the first feature, Mozart Loves Me, in the spring.

Regina Resnik is a veteran queen of the opera

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

"Me? Retired? Can you picture me golfing in Florida?"

Regina Resnik is right; what a silly question. I can't picture the 81-year-old opera legend anywhere but surrounded by music. While she has not sung in public for 10 years, Resnik coaches opera hopefuls from Italy to Canada — she recently visited Toronto to offer career advice to singers at the Canadian Opera Centre, presented by the International Resource Centre for Performing Arts.

Regina Resnik

"Young singers need guidance," she explains from her room at the Four Seasons Hotel in Toronto. Pearls drape her neck and jewels shimmer from her fingers, in true diva elegance.

"I enjoy working with students at a level where they need repair or correction, as I do in Italy."

She is director of vocal and interpretive art for the Euro Bottega, a workshop for singers in the European Union, and was recently appointed Master Teacher-in-Residence at the Mannes School in New York City, where she lives.

Next year, Resnik and her son (who is a part-time chazzan) will commemorate the 350th anniversary of the arrival of the first Jews to New York with a concert on American-Jewish composers such as Leonard Bernstein and Daniel Pour. In subsequent years, Resnik plans to organize more concerts under the title "Colours of the Diaspora", which focuses on the impact of Jewish secular music.

Resnik has mingled art and religion before, notably in her debut documentary Geto: The Historic Ghetto of Venice. She admits she became an expert on European ghettos after she produced, directed and wrote the PBS-aired documentary. Her late husband, sculptor and painter Arbit Blatas, introduced her to the subject and last January Resnik paid tribute to his work with another film, Blatas: A Painter's Homage to the Threepenny Opera.

In October, Decca decided to honour Resnik's impressive career with a double-disc collection of her operatic work, titled Dramatic Scenes and Arias.

But before the fame, Resnik was a young girl whose penchant for performance thrust her on amateur and high-school stages. Her "Cinderella career," as she calls it, truly began when the 20-year-old sang as Lady Macbeth in New York under the baton of Fritz Busch.

Two years later, she made her Metropolitan Opera debut as Leonara in Il Trovatore, then impressed audiences as Ellen Orford in the Met premiere of Britten's Peter Grimes. After 13 years as a leading soprano, Resnik shifted to mezzo roles, and in 20 operas she sang both the mezzo and soprano leads. Resnik estimates she has sang around 80 roles.

"I was surrounded by the greatest," Resnik gushes, casting her memory back to the likes of Jon Vickers, Maria Callas, Richard Tucker and Robert Merill. Her face suddenly hardens and she says, "Today, nobody has time to train properly. We live in such a rush-rush world."

Resnik is not so radical to suggest reliving the past. After all, she nurtures the future with her master classes. But she has some harsh words for modern opera.

"Opera has been turned upside-down, where directors who know nothing about music produce untraditional works." She calls this era "the age of the designer," as opposed to a century earlier where singers and conductors ruled the roost.

Opera aficionados praise Resnik for "owning" several respectable roles, including Carmen and the Countess in Queen of Spades.

"It's always impressive to hear talented singing coupled with talented acting," says Wayne Gooding, editor of Opera Canada. Her dramatic range, which extended to a Tony nomination in Cabaret, "truly makes her one of the greats," Gooding says.

"I enjoy stepping back and doing something different," Resnik says on her Broadway and directing work. She also shifted gears on a break from master sessions in Toronto, where she presented awards at this year's Rubies, Canadian opera's equivalent of the Oscars.

"It was great to see friends like [Canadian] Teresa Stratas," she says softly. "And I played my first mezzo Carmen in Toronto, so the whole trip was a nostalgic homecoming."

There are six million stories about the Holocaust because a story can be told about every person who perished during that tragic period of Jewish history.

Actually however, there are more than six million stories about the Holocaust. Every person who survived also has a story to tell.

Some of these stories have already been told. Books and films about the Holocaust keep pouring out. Many are mesmerizing tales of survival and heroism against unbelievable odds. And some are heartwarming stories about human beings.

One of these is vividly told with broad strokes in the wide-screen motion picture, Nowhere In Africa. This is a charming story of physical survival and the survival of a family during a most trying period of human history.

Nowhere In Africa tells the true story of the Redlich clan. Walter Redlich is a lawyer in prewar Germany. His wife Jettel comes from a wealthy bourgeois family and is accustomed to the better things in life. As the Nazi persecution of Jews increases, Walter Redlich recognizes the signs and leaves for Kenya in search of a refuge from the Nazi onslaught. He arranges for Jettel and their daughter, Regina, to join him in East Africa, where he has secured a job taking care of a farm.

Although his new post is well below the standards of his position in Germany, it provides an opportunity to keep his family safe from the Nazi persecution.

Jettel has difficulty adapting to her new environment. All the comforts of home have been taken away from her and she misses her friends and family. Even learning a new language is difficult for her. The result is that the marriage is severely tested.

On the other hand, the young daughter finds the experience exhilarating. She quickly picks up the local language and customs and makes friends with the native cook. And the older she gets, the more attached Regina becomes to the land and the local people.

After the outbreak of war, the British authorities begin arresting German nationals. The Redlich family are sent to detention camps where the conditions are fairly good.

Eventually, the detainees are released. Walter Redlich joins the British army and by the war's end, the family is fairly secure. But Walter is still attracted by the possibility of reviving his legal career in Germany and helping restore the German legal system. The family then enters into a debate about returning home.

The film is drawn on a large canvas. Although emotions are shown, the emphasis is on the overall story and the spectacular African countryside. And more time is spent on Regina's growing up and acculturation than on any other aspect of the story.

Still, this is a beautiful film about a little known aspect of survival during the Holocaust. The acting is solid all the way through and the use of English subtitles should not detract from the overall effect of the film.

Nowhere In Africa won the Academy Award last year for Best Foreign film and is now available on video and DVD from Columbia Tristar Home Video.

Business-Profile

Soviet emigre builds food supply business

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Stepping into Adolph Zarovinsky's food-processing plant is like walking into a high-tech NASA satellite factory or a research lab studying some new virus.

Security is very tight, as workers must enter through special, crime-proof doors; next, they must walk through a special foot bath that destroys any bacteria or other unwelcome hitchhikers they may unwittingly bring with them; they must don a lab coat and hair net before they go to work; and they must not wander from their designated area of work. Room temperatures are individually set.

Nothing can interfere with the smooth functioning of the Tiffany Gate Fine Foods plant, an operation that generates tens of millions of dollars in revenue and has been growing by between 20 and 30 per cent a year for each of the last 14 years.

As owner and manager of Tiffany Gate, a closely held corporation, Zarovinsky is not keen on divulging the company's full financials. But its tremendous growth, its roster of clients that includes pretty well every major grocer in Canada, its exports to the United States, its R and D department that is constantly working on new products, and its 72,000-square-foot facility suggest this business is going from strength to strength.

Zarovinsky, a native of Odessa in the former Soviet Union, believes he has hit upon an idea that caters directly to our time-strapped, culinarily-challenged population: why not offer customers prepared foods that are fresh, not frozen or canned, that are tasty, easy to prepare and won't break the family budget?

Tiffany Gate's foods include pastas, salads, sauces, rice dishes and meat entrees in a variety of ethnic styles, including Italian, Thai and Chinese. Offered in vacuum-sealed plastic containers that have long shelf lives, the foods were first into a market niche that traded on the "freshness" of the product.

Zarovinsky, an engineer by training, believes Tiffany Gate can offer the sort of freshness consumers crave by employing a production model first developed in the automotive industry – just-in-time delivery.

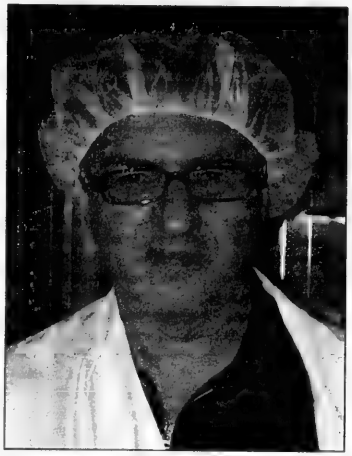
As an assembly line progresses, components are delivered by suppliers as they are needed, negating the necessity to maintain a large inventory. That keeps costs down and profits up.

To do this while keeping the food truly fresh, food providers would have to pre-sell their products to ensure they had a market and create the demand to get the production line going, Zarovinsky realized. "The majority in the food business works by making the product first and selling it second.

"The only secure way to make sure it's fresh is to sell it first," he said.

"I felt there was a lack of fresh, prepared food in grocery stores," he added.

If you were to wander into a Loblaws store, or one belonging to Dominion, Sobeys, IGA or Fortinos, to name but a few, you're likely to find one of Tiffany Gate's products in the store's refrigerated food section.



Adolph Zarovinsky

The company grew by addressing two sets of consumers, Zarovinsky explained. One group consisted of people who generally cook for themselves but on occasion find themselves short of time, don't want to eat take-out restaurant food and don't enjoy what's on offer in the frozen food sections of grocery stores. Also part of this group are people whose cooking skills are somewhat lacking.

A larger market segment comes from those already used to purchasing many of their meals, most often in the frozen or canned food sections of supermarkets. "These people can be converted to this new experience of fresh foods," he said.

Even restaurants have become Tiffany Gate customers, lapping up its pastas, rice dishes, sauces, soups and salad dressings.

The food industry is so massive that if Tiffany Gate grabs only one or two per cent, the rewards would be huge, he said, adding that the demographic trend is for consumers to spend less and less time in the kitchen preparing meals.

While other suppliers have latched onto Tiffany Gate's idea, Zarovinsky welcomes the challenge. "Competition makes us look better and it keeps us on our toes," he said.

"We supply to practically every major chain in Canada," Zarovinsky said. "This is a growing part of the food business and we were first to exploit it and develop it."

Zarovinsky, 54, started Tiffany Gate in 1989 after stints as a manager in the food services industry.

Growing up in Odessa, a port city on the Black Sea that is now part of Ukraine, Zarovinsky was conscious that many of those around him had to supplement their meagre, official incomes working for the state by other unconventional means.

Because it was so productive, the "alternative economy" was tolerated by the government.

When he was growing up in the 1960s, about 35 per cent of Odessa's population was Jewish and Jews were generally well accepted by their neighbours. When news of Israel's remarkable military victory in the Six Day War of 1967 reached them, the younger Jews of Odessa felt a surge of pride and "people became more overtly Jewish by wearing Magen Davids."

Small groups began studying Jewish history and contacts were made with Israel. "We were interrogated a number of times for this," Zarovinsky said, and "my parents were getting heart attacks from my participation," he joked.

By the early 1970s, Zarovinsky was studying mechanical engineering in the merchant marine academy – a prelude to military service on board the Soviet nuclear submarine fleet. But by then, he had obtained an Israeli visa, and he left two months before graduation, avoiding a dangerous assignment aboard one of the Soviet submarines that were known to offer little protection against radiation leaks.

In Israel, Zarovinsky enrolled in engineering at the Technion and later served in the Israel Defence Forces. He immigrated to Canada in 1975 with his wife Mary and daughter Tzipora. He quickly found work at a small company, Hayward Gordon, which supplied the mining and chemical industries.

From there he moved to Lever Brothers and afterwards, he started his own food distribution business, importing specialty health products from Europe that were unavailable in Canada.

Although it was only a small enterprise, he had no idea of how to run a business. He felt, however, that "the best way to learn how to swim is to jump into the water."

His experience in the Soviet Union and in Canada did not prepare him for his venture, he said, but "at the end of the day, you have to go in and take a plunge. You can't anticipate everything. I was in blissful ignorance of the real world, so I did it."

He raised capital from friends and relatives. Although the business never made money, a few years later, he sold it for a profit and went back to work for others. By that time, "I knew I wanted to be in the food business, but don't ask me why. It's an inexplicable reason."

Over the years, he upgraded his education by taking business courses at the University of Toronto, and one of his employers sent him and other senior managers for more training at the Kellogg School of Business at Northwestern University.

By the time he started Tiffany Gate, he had business smarts, and he knew he "had to come up with something that would give me an advantage, a niche. That's how we came up with this idea."

Asked whether his Soviet background had any role in his success, Zarovinsky replied, "Any human being, given an opportunity and a willingness to work can do just about anything. The only necessary condition for that is freedom to do your own thing and to benefit from the fruits of your labour. The rest is up to the individual and it's not specific to Russians or any other ethnic group."

Volleyball coach looking for new blood

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's Halloween and George Shermer is looking for some new blood.

No, Shermer is not some bloodsucking ghoul or vampire getting into the spirit of the season.

Rather, the lanky Czech-born entrepreneur is actively recruiting young Jewish volleyball players who he hopes will form the nucleus of a Maccabiah-bound team in the years to come.

Abiding by the coach's credo to get 'em while they're young, Shermer is looking for kids in their mid-teens whom he can train, sculpt and mould into good volleyball players.

While previous volleyball experience is useful, it's not a prerequisite. Shermer said he's looking for dedicated athletes who are team-oriented and love sports. And you don't have to be over six feet tall to apply.

Shermer, who coached Canada's entry at the 2001 Maccabiah Games in Israel, believes what the team needs is "kids who are interested in becoming competitive indoor volleyball players."

Participants will benefit from Shermer's coaching and that of his two assistant coaches, his sons Elie and Daniel. Both were top players last year with Loyalist College in Belleville and helped make Loyalist the Ontario college champions. Loyalist lost to a team from Red Deer in a contest for the national title.

Josh Binstock will serve as a guest coach. Binstock, a mainstay of the Canadian Maccabiah team, is a key member of the University of Toronto volleyball team.

Shermer will hold his volleyball camp on Tuesday nights at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute and the team will also play, beginning in January, in the Ontario Volleyball Association's competitive league.

The ultimate goal is to prepare a team that could win a medal at the 2005 games in Israel, he said, adding players will still have to get past open tryouts for a spot on the team.

At the last games two years ago, Canada finished fifth. The team, he said, featured a blend of very young, inexperienced players and older players (over 30) who formed the core of the team, but ran out of gas late in games.

Shermer believes a different blend of players would have a better chance of capturing a medal. For more information, contact Shermer at 416-785-6677.

Maccabi Canada honours Robert Lantos at gala dinner

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In an evening of good cheer, good food and thought-provoking speeches, one moment stood out for its emotional impact.

Speaking at a glittering dinner last week at the Sheraton Centre in his honour, Robert Lantos paused to recall the intense emotions he experience during the opening ceremonies of the 2001 Maccabiah Games.

Lantos had travelled to Israel to see his son, Ari, compete for Canada in water polo, as he himself had done in 1969. He found his indignation rising as he drove to Teddy Stadium and witnessed first-hand the extreme security measures undertaken by Israel to make sure the games proceeded without incident.

Israeli officials, he thought, were forced to turn the country "into an armed camp to host a sports competition." Pausing briefly to compose himself, Lantos recounted that his indignation turned to inspiration when he joined Jews from around the world at the opening ceremonies.

"Had you been there, they would have taken your breath away, as they did mine," he said.

The Maccabiah Games are much more than a sports event, he continued. They are a symbol of Jewish survival and a vital bridge between the Jewish diaspora and the State of Israel. What's more, they are "a slap in the face of those who want to destroy Israel."

Lantos, a member of the Order of Canada and a longtime supporter of the Maccabiah movement, was speaking at the gala dinner held by Maccabi Canada to kick off its two-year, $4-million fundraising effort to underwrite the cost of sending a team to the 17th Maccabiah Games in July 2005. The dinner was attended by 670 people, said Tom Bacher, senior vice-president of Maccabi Canada.

Lantos, the founder of Alliance Communications Corporation, a film entertainment company, said his first experience at the 1969 Games was memorable.

He was "enthralled and amazed that the other athletes were all Jewish," he said. It made him realize that the fate of Jews and the fate of Israel are "inextricably intertwined" and that the survival of Israel is the cornerstone for the survival of Jews.

A native of Budapest, Hungary, Lantos was conscious that elite Jewish athletes faced anti-Semitic barriers that hindered their success.

He noted that a champion fencer was well-known in Hungary for converting to Christianity because he could not compete otherwise. And his mother, years before when she was a 12-year-old in competitive swimming, was not allowed to collect the medal she had won.

The Maccabi movement allows Jews to compete without any handicaps, Lantos said. The original Maccabees, he said, were Jewish resistance fighters and fierce warriors who freed ancient Israel from Greek overlords.

As the son of Holocaust survivors, he said he identified with the image of Jews as fierce competitors who can't be pushed around.

Lantos quoted Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who told those who braved the Palestinian terrorist threat to attend the 2001 Maccabiah that "our enemies are trying to isolate us [Israel] from the rest of the world, and now they are trying to isolate us from each other."

In his introductory remarks, Lawrence Hart, national president of Maccabi Canada, traced the history of the modern Maccabi organization to the 19th century gymnastic movement in Germany and the Austro-Hungarian empire.

The movement held its first Maccabiah Games in British-mandated Palestine in 1935, and, after delay caused by World War II, the games resumed in 1950, when Canada sent its first team. Only 800 athletes participated in that first postwar competition, but by 1997, more than 5,000 competitors from around the world, including former Soviet republics, took part.

Today, Jews are experiencing the re-emergence of the worst anti-Semitism in 50 years, which aims in part to delegitimize Israel as a state and demonize its supporters, Hart said.

The Maccabi movement, though not a political organization, focuses on instilling a strong Jewish identity in its young competitors, one linked to Israel, he said.

Maccabi Canada, he continued, expects that young people who visit Israel as part of a Maccabi experience, will return "invigorated and inspired," committed to Israel and the Jewish people.

Other remarks were delivered by TV mogul Moses Znaimer, longtime Lantos friend Laszlo Bartha, filmmaker Atom Egoyan, Israeli consul gemeral Ya'acov Brosh and documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobivici, who presented a nine-minute film on the history of the Maccabi movement.

British-based journalist Barbara Amiel, who was introduced by defence lawyer Eddie Greenspan, delivered the keynote address (please see related article on page 5).

CBC news anchor Peter Mansbridge hosted the evening, while other dignitaries included newspaper publisher Conrad Black; former Ontario premier David Peterson; Ontario Attorney General Michael Bryant; Rabbi Gunther Plaut, who competed in the 1935 Games in tennis; and Sid Himel, a member of Canada's 1950 team; former Canadian Olympians Mark McCoy (1992 Barcelona), Donovan Bailey (1996 Atlanta), Jamie Sale and David Pelletier (2002 Salt Lake City); Toronto Argonaut Noah Cantor; and a number of former Maccabi athletes.

Spiritual repair

something 20

By JODI KOVITZ

The concept of tikkun olam, or repairing the world through social action, is one of the categories of tzedakah. It is our duty as Jews to help those less fortunate than ourselves, and to take on "world-fixing" activities, such as fighting discrimination, ignorance and injustice, and repairing harm done to the environment.

According to Rabbi Jeremy Schwartz, the use of the term "tikkum olam" is the result of a fairly recent mixing of two streams of Jewish thought. The first is biblical: the insistence of the prophets of Israel that oppression of the weak and the poor was not only sinful, but tantamount to idolatrous rebellion against a living God. Rabbi Schwartz also says tikkun olam derives its importance from the 16th-century kabbalistic teachings of Rabbi Isaac Luria. Luria taught that in the process of creating the universe, God sent forth "a pure divine light that could not be contained by the vessels into which it flowed." An explosion ensued, scattering broken shards or sparks of holiness across the new universe. According to Luria, the human task in this world of "broken-ness" is repair: tikkun.

To me, there is something really special about the tikkun olam concept. I engage in tikkun olam out of a sense of ethical obligation, but it is also one of the few rituals through which I manifest my own spirituality. In talking to my peers, I have learned that I am not alone in this feeling.

I was reminded, during a course I took several years ago, at Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Education, that Judaism is not only a religion, but rather a way of life. Our teacher, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, explained that in Judaism, it is not enough to have high expectations but show no commitment. She said we must act in order to find meaning in being Jewish. Even if rituals we are not used to practising feel somewhat empty or difficult at the beginning, they will become meaningful in time. Moving into a state of holiness in Judaism comes through commitment, intention and action.

Since I was a little girl, I have made it my business to help out in the community in whatever way I can. However, I never saw this inclination and behaviour as part of my spiritual identity until I changed my perspective on where this ritual fit into my life. Recently, I have started to see my commitment to bettering the community as one of the central facets of my Jewish identity.

Now I experience moments of holiness not only in synagogue, but while in the midst of reading a newspaper to my visually impaired friend or in giving money to a homeless person on the street. These experiences make me feel small, and fill me with a deep sense of awe and wonder. In January, I will begin the ultimate spiritual experience: spending a semester working at a legal aid clinic in Toronto's Parkdale community. I will be providing legal services and engaging in social action initiatives on behalf of a community that desperately needs assistance.

These days, the world seems so broken it might seem difficult to remain enthusiastic about taking baby steps toward fixing it. Hopefully, by injecting a sense of spirituality into this ethical obligation, we will feel renewed and keep trying, no matter how daunting the task may seem at times.

As always, I welcome your feedback at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

While every effort is being made to postpone the cancellation of the new Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC), Jewish parents should be aware that another form of government assistance to Jewish day schools is inevitable.

First, we must never forget that as long as Ontario Catholic schools are funded, as long as other provinces interpret the British North America Act (BNA) so as to grant funding to faith-based schools, and as long as progressive jurisdictions worldwide (France, Sweden, United Kingdom and Australia, to name a few) support Jewish schools, the injustice is a moral stain on our province that can be neither tolerated nor justified. Any cancellation of the last government's solution (which was only partial) must simultaneously begin a process to find a new solution acceptable to both the new government and faith-based schools.

This is probably the best time for all concerned citizens of Ontario to re-examine what we mean by public school education. Public schools are a relatively recent phenomenon in the long history of education. Indeed, they are very new when compared to our ancient dictum, v'shinantam l'vanecha – "you shall teach your children diligently." While Jewish systems of education have developed over the centuries and in every land we have inhabited, public school education is only beginning to grow and change.

But has public school education kept up with Ontario? This great province has become a true mosaic of every culture imaginable, with representation from a virtual rainbow of ethnicities. Yet the funding structure of our public schools is essentially the same as it was during the BNA era.

What if the public model could be expanded to include those who wish to be educated in the mix and those who wish to celebrate their faith-based education in a separate setting, a place where the public curriculum would be complemented by a rich infusion of culture-specific literature, values, music, spirituality and history? Can a mature Ontario join other culturally diverse jurisdictions that share the same vision?

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Arafat worth over $1 billion: CBS

By NATAN GUTTMAN and LIMOR TEVET
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is transferring $100,000 (US) a month from PA monies to his wife, Suha, who is living in Paris, according to the CBS television program 60 Minutes.

In a Nov. 9 report, the program said the money goes to support a luxurious lifestyle for 40-year-old Suha and the couple's eight-year-old daughter Zahwa.

The report emphasized that Suha Arafat's monthly support payments come from PA public monies in Arafat's private accounts.

Reportedly sends $100,000 each month to wife living in luxury in Paris

CBS news and 60 Minutes correspondent Lesley Stahl interviewed PA Finance Minister Salam Fayyad, who related his efforts to expose the graft of the PA and to uncover secret bank accounts where PA money was being transferred.

Fayyad is currently trying to track down all the PA-allocated money that never reached its intended destination.

U.S. officials say Arafat "has a personal nest egg of between $1 billion and $3 billion" (all figures US), the program reported.

Part of Arafat's wealth is in a secret portfolio worth close to $1 billion.

"Although the money for the portfolio came fom public funds like Palestinian taxes, virtually none of it was used for the Palestinian people. It was all controlled by Arafat. And… none of those dealings were made public," the program said.

Remembrance Day

Three years ago, Hanna de Vries Stavland, a Dutch-born musician and writer who lives in Stavanger, Norway, was in the Norwegian town of Egersund, about 90 kilometres from home, in connection with a historical book she had written about a local parson's wife.

While there, she happened to see a photo of a cemetery in Dalane Tidende, a local newspaper. The picture piqued her curiosity.

To her astonishment, the Allied military gravesite in the Egersund churchyard included a headstone emblazoned with a Star of David. It was the grave of Philip Foster, a squadron leader in the Royal Canadian Air Force (RCAF) who was killed in action during World War II.

"What the Jews did as warriors is not especially well-known or appreciated," de Vries Stavland said during a visit in September to the Toronto home of Foster's distant cousin Charles Kadin. Foster's sister, Freeda Baron, came in from Winnipeg for the occasion.

(Baron and Kadin say they don't know exactly how they are related, but they bonded some 30 years ago, partly over a mutual interest in the memory of her brother.)

After her visit to Egersund, de Vries Stavland tracked Baron down through the Jewish Heritage Institute in Winnipeg. Baron, an 82-year-old retired schoolteacher, replied to de Vries Stavland and put her in touch with Kadin, an aviation artist and aviation history buff, to fill in the military background.

De Vries Stavland – who was born in 1943 to a Jewish doctor and his wife, a nurse who converted to Judaism – ended up writing an extensively researched article for Dalane Tidende.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Rabbi on Press Council

TORONTO — Rabbi Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus of Temple Anshe Shalom in Hamilton and The CJN's books columnist, has been chosen to serve a two-year term on the Ontario Press Council, beginning in January. He succeeds Anglican Bishop Colin Johnson, who is completing the maximum eight years on council. The 21-member press council, founded in 1972, has 219 member papers. It considers specific complaints from readers about the conduct of its members that cannot be worked out between the complainant and the newspaper.

ISRAEL

Dismantle Town: Shinui

JERUSALEM — Shinui, the second-largest party in Israel's governing coalition, said last week it wants to dismantle Netzarim, a settlement in Gaza, and end "targeted killings" of Palestinian terrorists in order to revive peace talks.

Memorial Vandalized

TEL AVIV — Three Israelis were arrested last week for vandalizing a memorial to assassinated Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin. An indictment was filed against Iris Cohen, 38, of Jerusalem, who is accused of vandalizing posters near the Tel Aviv memorial. Indictments were also filed against Yeshayahu Cohen, 23, and Avi Salah, 18, for spitting on the memorial.

David Bar-Ilan Dies

JERUSALEM — David Bar-Illan, a former editor of the Jerusalem Post and aide to former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, died last week in Jerusalem. He was 73 and had been in failing health following a heart attack three years ago. He served as editor-in-chief of the Post from 1992 to 1996 and served as director of communications in the Prime Minister's Office under Netanyahu from 1996 to 1999. He was also a concert pianist who recorded several albums. Many of his popular "Eye on the Media" columns, which skewered press treatment of Israel, were collected in a book of the same name.

WORLD

New Jewish Yukos Head

MOSCOW — A Russian-born American Jew was named the new head of the Yukos oil giant last week after its CEO resigned. Simon Kukes will replace Yukos founder Mikhail Khodorkovsky, who resigned as CEO in a move he said was aimed at shielding his company from legal attack. Khodorkovsky, who is also Jewish, remains in a Moscow jail after his arrest on charges of fraud and tax evasion late last month. His arrest and the pressure on Yukos are widely regarded as politically motivated. Sources close to Khodorkovsky said his resignation could free him up to consider running for Russian president. Also last week, Russian President Vladimir Putin told visiting Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that the crackdown on Yukos is not motivated by anti-Semitism.

Israeli UN Motion

NEW YORK — Israel last week proposed its first resolution at the United Nations since 1976, one "expressing concern over the fact that Israeli children are subject to Palestinian terrorism," said Ariel Milo, an official at Israel's UN mission. The resolution was circulated in the wake of an Egyptian-sponsored resolution expressing concern over Palestinian children suffering under Israeli occupation. "Basically, we changed the rules of the game" by moving from a defensive to offensive position, Milo said.

Russian-Israeli Oil Deal

MOSCOW — Russian oil will flow through an Israeli pipeline. The deal was announced last week in Moscow as Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon returned to Israel from a three-day visit with Russian President Vladimir Putin. The oil will flow through a line run by the Eilat-Ashkelon Oil Pipeline Company, the firm said. The oil will travel to Asia.

Anti-Hamas Legislation

SYDNEY — The Australian government was set last week to introduce a law in the Australian Parliament that makes contact with Hamas illegal. It would impose a maximum penalty of 25 years in jail for funding or otherwise aiding the terrorist organization.

Army Not Rife with Anti-Semitism: Minister

BERLIN — German Defence Minister Peter Struck said last week he is sure that anti-Jewish views endorsed by a top general are not widespread in the army, and he stressed that all German soldiers are taught about Germany's Nazi past.

Earlier in the week, Struck fired the head of the elite KSK special forces, Reinhard Guenzel, almost immediately after learning that Guenzel wrote a letter of support on army notepaper to a lawmaker who sparked outrage with comments widely seen as belittling the Holocaust.

Martin Hohmann, a conservative member of parliament, has been under pressure to resign for saying in a speech last month that Jews, like Germans, could be seen as "perpetrators" because they participated in execution squads during the Russian Revolution. Guenzel told Hohmann most Germans shared the lawmaker's views.

Struck said regular studies of the attitudes of conscripts and professional soldiers of all ranks are made to ensure the army remains anchored in democracy. "I have no reason to assume the general's views are shared – quite the contrary," he told a news conference, adding he would study the 59-year-old Guenzel's files for signs of extremist views.

But a group of 100 past and present officers said in a statement that Guenzel is "not an isolated case" and that there are more extremists in the army, including "a considerable number in leadership positions who lack democratic awareness."

Architect communicates lessons of Holocaust

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When architect Daniel Libeskind creates building designs, the symbolism and meaning of the structure is foremost in his mind.

"Architecture communicates a story," says. "Very often, the story goes to depths and heights that have no words."

One such story is the Holocaust.

Libeskind, the designer of the acclaimed Jewish Museum Berlin, spoke to a capacity audience at Beth Tzedec Synagogue Nov. 8 as part of Holocaust Education Week.

In a talk called "Designing Sacred Space: Memorializing the Holocaust," he discussed his efforts to communicate the lessons and stories of the Holocaust through architecture.

"There is a need to bring the memory [of the Holocaust] to Germans," said Libeskind, who also designed the Felix Nussbaum Museum in Osnabruck.

"[Germans should] experience the culture that was there and experience the total loss of a culture."

As a child of Holocaust survivors from Lodz, Poland, Libeskind felt a strong personal connection when he worked on the Felix Nussbaum Museum, which was completed in 1998.

Nussbaum was a painter from Osnabruck, an obscure, sparsely populated town in northern Germany.

Libeskind recalled a self-portrait created by Nussbaum in 1933, the year the Nazis came to power, in which the painter displays his Jewish identify card and wears an ominous expression.

"When I saw that haunted look, I got to know him," Libeskind said. Nussbaum fled Germany but was arrested in Brussels and sent to his death in Auschwitz.

The museum's three sections contain many connections to Nussbaum's life.

The oak section, whose theme is Osnabruck, contains Nussbaum's pre-1933 paintings.

The concrete section is bleaker, depicting the emptiness and disorientation Nussbaum experienced during his exile.

And in the final section, made of zinc, there is a 17th-century steel bridge, symbolic of a pathway to the future.

"The Holocaust is about how the past is communicated to the present and to future generations," Libeskind said.

Libeskind marvelled at the museum's success, noting that Osnabruck has a population of 160,000 but annual attendance at the museum is about 250,000.

The museum is home to 170 of Nussbaum's paintings and graphic works, as well as biographical materials and historical documents.

But the Libeskind project that has garnered the most media attention and attracted more visitors than any other museum in Germany is the Jewish Museum Berlin. Like the Nussbaum museum, its architecture is representative of the periods of darkness and light in German-Jewish history and culture.

For example, in some areas, visitors can see, but not enter, rooms that are empty. Libeskind referred to this as "voided voids."

"The void is the impenetrable emptiness across which the absence of Berlin's Jewish citizens is made apparent to the visitor," he has written.

The museum was supposed to officially open on Sept. 11, 2001, with Libeskind and various family and friends flying in for the ceremony.

But the terrorist attacks grounded their planes, making the ceremony impossible.

The irony is not lost on Libeskind, who is currently leading a design team participating in the World Trade Center Design Study.

"It's a tremendous task," Libeskind said of the project, which has become complicated as stakeholders have different and sometimes competing visions.

"It [requires] navigating through a labyrinth. [But] compromise is good."

Before he began his architecture career, Libeskind was a virtuoso pianist who performed at Carnegie Hall in 1960 when he was only 14 years old.

After receiving his architecture degree in 1970, Libeskind completed post-graduate work in architecture theory and history.

He has garnered numerous awards and has designed many landmark buildings in such places as Denmark, England and Mexico.

In Canada, he is currently working on the extension of the Royal Ontario Museum, which is slated to open December 2005.

Beware the new tactic

From the editor's desk

Disingenuous and dangerous winds are blowing towards Israel from certain intellectual circles.

Whether from genuine "fatigue" over the ugly and seemingly unending fighting between Israel and the Palestinian Authority's (PA) terrorist axis or from a desire to achieve indirectly what the Arab world has never been able to achieve directly, more people are suggesting that the only solution to the conflict is establishment of one state to accommodate the competing nationalisms of the Israelis and the Palestinians.

The effect of such a proposal, of course, would be the elimination of a sovereign Jewish state.

The well-meaning proponents of a one-state solution, to give them the benefit of the doubt at least for argument's sake, do not seem to be bothered by this outcome, it being, after all, a logical, even necessary, sequela of the imperative to fairness and the democratic process. In that event, a national home for the Jews would have been a noble experiment that had outlived its time and utility, alas.

The ill-meaning proponents of a single, binational state, on the other hand, would celebrate the outcome. And they would probably share a good laugh among themselves too, for having been boosted in their malevolent cause, by some of the West's thoughtful, intellectual elite.

Last month, The Globe and Mail's Middle East correspondent, Paul Adams, wrote about the re-emergence in the Middle East of the idea of a binational, one-state solution. "In recent weeks, Palestinian leaders as diverse as the leading peace activist Sari Nusseibeh and the militant leader Marwan Barghouti (who is on trial in Israel accused of organizing terrorist murders), have suggested that the days of the two-state solution may soon be over.

"'If [the Israeli] occupation does not end unilaterally or through negotiations,' Barghouti said in his closing statement at his trial recently, 'then there is only one solution: one state for two peoples.'

"Michael Tarazi, an American-born legal adviser to the Palestinian Liberation Organization, has gone further, arguing that Palestinians should abandon the two-state strategy altogether. Instead, he says they should fight for a single state encompassing both Israel and the Palestinian territories, containing both Arabs and Jews. Instead of striving for an independent state, the argument goes, Palestinians should be campaigning for equal rights as citizens in a binational state.

"Who in the West, the argument goes, could resist the idea of a democracy based on one person, one vote?…

"The increasing appeal of the one-state idea," Adams wrote, "arises from the collapse of the hope for Palestinian statehood once embodied in the PA."

Three days before the Adams article appeared in The Globe and Mail, New York University professor Tony Judt propounded the binational, one-state solution in an op-ed article in the Los Angeles Times. Two weeks later, it appeared in the prestigious New York Review of Books in expanded form.

Ominously, therefore, the call for the democratic dismantling of Israel does not emanate only from Israel's foes close by the battleground. It is being echoed in the halls of academia in Manhattan as well.

Thankfully, however, there are also opposing thinkers who not only understand too well the implications of a one-state proposal but are shocked that it has been seriously raised.

For example, in the Oct. 27 issue of The New Republic, its literary editor, Leon Wieseltier, pounced upon Judt like a lion defending her cubs against a dangerous intruder.

"Judt calls his article 'Israel: The Alternative.' But let us read strenuously. A binational state is not the alternative for Israel. It is the alternative to Israel. Judt and his editors have crossed the line from the criticism of Israel's policy to the criticism of Israel's existence. The right in Israel and America are therefore greatly in their debt: they have given credence to the suspicion that the criticism of Israel's policy is always nothing other than the criticism of Israel's existence. They have taken the heroic step of calling for the dismantling of the Jewish state."

In his typically comprehensive and biting manner, Wieseltier brilliantly analyzes and dispatches each of the four reasons put forward by Judt for advancing the idea of a binational state.

One of Judt's reasons, however, requires special attention because it is the one most frequently expressed by certain Jews and thus, to my mind, the saddest: Judt is, simply, embarrassed by Israel. He even writes: "The behaviour of a self-described Jewish state affects the way everyone else looks at Jews. The increased incidence of attacks on Jews in Europe and elsewhere is primarily attributable to misdirected efforts, often by young Muslims, to get back at Israel… The depressing truth is that Israel today is bad for the Jews."

Wieseltier dealt with it superbly. "It is the essence of all prejudice to call its object its cause. But if you explain anti-Semitism as a response to Jews, and racism as a response to blacks, and misogyny as a response to women, then you have not understood it. You have reproduced it."

Wieseltier's essay should be read widely by anyone wishing to equip himself with the means to answer the call for the establishment of a binational single state as a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. And let supporters of Israel not delude ourselves. It is not merely a well-intentioned call. It is an ill wind blowing danger towards Israel.

Cotler receives Plaut Humanitarian Award

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the post-Durban world, anti-Semitic incidents seem to be an everyday occurrence, so it was hardly a surprise that within a day or two of Montreal MP Irwin Cotler speaking out against global anti-Semitism, Hezbollah's Al-Manar TV broadcast a series based on The Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

Called Al-Shaat (The Diaspora) the Lebanese broadcast also came only a few weeks after the now-retired Malaysian prime minister, Mahathir Mohamad, was applauded by leaders of 57 Muslim nations for a speech that contained classic anti-Semitic conspiracy theories about backroom Jewish world control.

A longstanding human rights advocate, Cotler has devised an analytic framework to dissect the new anti-Semitism. He pronounced on his findings at Holy Blossom Temple last week while accepting the W. Gunther Plaut Humanitarian Award for "an outstanding contribution to the community and to human rights."

Cotler, who has represented prisoners of conscience Nathan Sharansky, Andrei Sakharov and Nelson Mandela, said Jews no longer face traditional anti-Semitism, with its discrimination in employment and education. Today's anti-Semitism has many faces, but its defining feature is the discrimination and assault upon the right of the Jewish people to live equally among the nations, he said.

In the Middle East, he said, a new "genocidal anti-Semitism" has developed, as witnessed by the public call by Islamic groups for the destruction of Israel and the killing of Jews wherever they may be.

Terrorism is the weapon of choice for organizations such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah, whose very covenants explicitly state their goals of destroying Israel and killing Jews, he said.

Taking this into account, Cotler argued that the term "suicide bomber,"with its suggestions of martyrdom, should be replaced by the term "genocidal bombers" to better reflect terrorists' intent and purpose.

In the "new anti-Semitism," Islamic religious leaders issue "fatwas," execution warrants for the destruction of Israel and the killing of Jews, as a religious obligation, making "Israel emerge as the Salman Rushdie of nations."

At the same time, United Nations members call for the destruction of a fellow member, while the UN Committee on Human Rights has failed to condemn any act of terrorism against Israel, he said.

As Israel has emerged as the "organizing idiom of Judaism today," so has hatred and hostility to Jews become hatred and hostility to Israel, Cotler continued. Jews are denied the right to self-determination, a right accorded all other peoples, while Israel is delegitimized and Israel and Jews are ascribed with ""all the evils of the world."

"That causes Israel to emerge, as it did at [the 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism], as the new anti-Christ of our time," he said.

What's most pernicious is that the "demonization of Israel has occurred as part of the anti-racism struggle. It's masked as part of the larger movement against racism," Cotler said.

The UN's 1975 vote to equate Zionism with racism, which was subsequently reversed, but which "has been mainstreamed in the popular culture," was once described by Sakharov, the former Soviet dissident, as "giving the abomination of anti-Semitism the appearance of international legal sanction," Cotler said.

Turning to what he called "ideological anti-Semitism," Cotler said opponents of Israel do not merely criticize its policies, but describe it as an "apartheid state" with Nazi-like characteristics, thereby suggesting the struggle against racism requires that Israel be dismantled.

That has had an impact on Jewish students on campus, who are confronted with a kind of "pincer movement" of conflicting values. If they share anti-racist sentiments but identify with Israel, they alienate themselves from the predominant anti-racist culture. If they wish to identify strongly with the anti-racist culture on campus, "they find themselves alienated from Israel," he said.

Jews, he concluded, are like the proverbial canary in the coal mine, giving an early warning of danger. "It begins with the Jews, but it does not end with the Jews."

The assaults on Israel and Jews should be a concern to other people and seen as a threat to the authenticity of international law, Cotler said, adding that the struggle against anti-Semitism is part of the larger struggle for human rights.

Chapel at Miles Nadal JCC gets new home

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

After being uprooted for several months during the renovations at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (JCC), the Michael Bernstein Chapel has come to roost in a brand-new home.

The bright, airy, third-floor Resource Room is a stark contrast to the chapel's original space – a janitorial closet that was the only available location when congregants began holding Sunday morning services at the JCC 29 years ago.

"We were underneath the weight room," recalls congregation president Coleman Bernstein, a regular since 1981. "Every time someone dropped a weight, we could feel it."

On a recent Sunday morning, about 100 people gathered for a special service to rededicate the chapel.

Rabbi Asher Turin, who gives a dvar Torah every Thursday, compared the festivities to the re-dedication of the Temple on Chanukah.

He described the congregation of about 30 regulars as a unique and inclusive group whose connection to one another is based on "brotherly love and friendship in the service of God."

The group, made up mainly of men over 65, share a genuine camaraderie, he added. "It's like mishpachah. We fight like brothers. Then we kiss and make up."

Naomi Rose, executive director of the Miles Nadal JCC, praised the congregants for their sense of community. "They welcome everybody into the service… They're the heart and soul of what goes on here… The chapel is the mainstay of the spirit of the JCC."

In his speech, Bernstein acknowledged the members' patience and perseverance during the disruptive renovation period that has kept the health club out of commission. "I have a special thank you for our many dedicated daveners who have continued to come to services on Thursdays and Sundays, despite the fact that they were unable to work out either before or after services due to the destruction of the lower level [of the centre]."

The congregation was started by a few handball players. Some were leaving early on Sundays to say Kaddish, and a minyan was started so that they could daven at the JCC.

Chapel trustee Herb Finkelstein, one of the founding members, said that at 40, he was "the baby in the group" when the minyan was first put together in 1974.

After a Torah from the former Berkeley Street Shul was donated, the members added services on Thursdays and Rosh Chodesh so that they could read the Torah.

In 1982, Bernstein and his late brother Leonard refurbished a space on the first floor allocated to the chapel, naming it in memory of their late brother Michael Bernstein, a soldier killed in action in Italy in 1944.

From the beginning, the congregants have had a participatory service. With the help of Cantor David Nemtzov, people take turns reading. After services, they shmooze and kibbitz over schnapps and a substantial kiddush.

The congregants have paid for the decor of the new Chapel room, which will also serve as a library and resource room for the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School. Lou Kozlov, who commissioned a large stained glass mural in memory of his late wife Lillian, is also funding the bookshelves for the library.

Other stained glass windows previously donated to the first floor chapel room were refurbished and rededicated. Founding member Sydney Greenstein and his wife Jean unveiled a mural in memory of their daughter Marney, while Arthur and Shelly Ganz unveiled top windows in memory of his father Sam Ganz.

Rosenbergs' son recalls infamous spy case

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When Robert Meeropol penned a book detailing his life as the son of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg – the first American civilians executed for treason – he wanted to name it "Constructive Revenge."

While the publisher nixed his title, Meeropol's life has indeed stayed true to it.

As executive director of the Rosenberg Fund for Children (RFC), he has helped provide $1.25 million in grants, as well as emotional and educational support, to numerous children of activists who have been negatively targeted for their work.

"The Rosenberg Fund for Children is my constructive revenge," Meeropol told a packed Winchevsky Centre audience recently, where his lecture and book signing kicked off the Toronto Jewish Book Fair.

The RFC was established in 1990 "to provide for the educational and emotional needs of children whose parents have suffered because of their progressive activities."

Robyn Pitawanakwat, the daughter of native Canadian activist Mary Pitawanakwat, who suffered racism and sexism as a result of her activism, spoke about how RFC grants have helped her get an education.

"I've been so [fortunate] to have RFC in my life," said Pitawanakwat. "It has made such a difference."

Meeropol's book, An Execution in the Family, was published earlier this year to mark the 50th anniversary of his parents' deaths.

The book details his personal odyssey to find out the truth about his parents' case and engage in political activism.

Julius and Ethel Rosenberg were executed on June 19, 1953 for conspiracy to commit espionage. But the unwritten charge was that they had provided atomic bomb secrets to the Soviet Union.

The Rosenbergs always maintained their innocence, and they invoked the Fifth Amendment and refused to answer prosecutors' questions about their political affiliations.

The case hinged on the testimony of David and Ruth Greenglass, Ethel's brother and sister-in-law.

The Greenglasses testified that Julius and Ethel recruited David into an atomic spy ring in 1944 and that David, who worked where the atomic bomb was built in New Mexico, provided Julius with a set of sketches and a theoretical description of the bomb in 1945.

David also testified that Ethel was present when the sketches were provided and typed notes on the meeting.

When FBI documents on the case were made public in the 1970s, a number of telling details came to light.

For instance, atomic scientists did not view the sketches from Greenglass until years after the Rosenbergs' execution.

Moreover, the scientists believed Greenglass' material was "too incomplete, ambiguous and even incorrect to be of any service or value to the Russians in shortening the time required to develop their nuclear bombs."

In 2001, Greenglass appeared in a disguise on the CBS television show 60 Minutes and revealed that Ethel was not present at the infamous meeting in 1945, nor did she take notes on it.

"What Greenglass did is unforgivable," Meeropol said. "On a personal level, he is dead to me."

Meeropol was three years old when his parents were arrested and six when they were executed.

While his memories of the time reflect his young age, he said, "I knew there was something dangerous out there that was taking my parents away."

He also recalls visiting his parents in prison, where he hid behind their attorney to avoid having his photograph taken.

After the executions, Meeropol said, "I pretended not to understand what was going on so adults would not fuss over me."

But he recalls clearly understanding the finality of his parents' death shortly after the execution.

Abel and Ann Meeropol raised Meeropol and his brother Michael in what he described as a good home.

He said both the Meeropols and Michael always said that his birth parents were innocent.

By his late teens, Meeropol began researching his parents' case. In the late 1970s, he and Michael successfully sued the FBI and CIA to gain access to 300,000 previously secret documents about the case.

Meeropol said he can't categorically say that his parents were not guilty of the specific charge "conspiracy to commit espionage."

But he has written that the evidence indicates that "neither Julius nor Ethel Rosenberg was a member of an atomic spy ring that stole the secret of the atomic bomb. Neither committed the crimes they were executed for."

For years, researchers have discussed the role anti-Semitism played in the Rosenberg case.

Meeropol noted that both the prosecutors and the presiding judge were Jewish and that they were working in a political context in which many Jews felt compelled to demonstrate their loyalty to the United States and their disdain for communism.

Meeropol said he regrets that he didn't write about the role anti-Semitism played in his parents' case, but that isn't the book's focus.

"The book is really a story of how I survived my childhood and how I made something good come of it," he said.

Meeropol said he is thankful to his adoptive parents for not making his birth parents' story a dark family secret.

"It was on the table from the very beginning," he said. "It turned out to be a healthy thing, because it was talked about."

Both Meeropol and his brother have enjoyed successful careers. Robert is a lawyer, activist and public speaker, while Michael is an economics professor.

From the past, a warning

Jewish history is such that there is nothing left to shock our sensibilities. Jews have been vilified, abused and maligned in every imaginable manner of human depredation. The foul, dark nadir of the depredations came in the last century.

Sixty-five years ago this week, on Nov. 9-10, violence against the Jews of Europe became more than an ominous Nazi threat. It became real, very horribly real.

In his book The Holocaust (Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1985), eminent historian Martin Gilbert described some of the events that unfolded on that terrible day. "Bonfires were lit in every neighbourhood where Jews lived. On them were thrown prayer books, Torah scrolls and countless volumes of philosophy, history and poetry. In thousands of streets, Jews were chased, reviled and beaten up.

"In 24 hours of street violence, 91 Jews were killed. More than 30,000 – one in 10 of those who remained – were arrested and sent to concentration camps. Before most of them were released two to three months later, as many as 1,000 had been murdered, 244 of them in Buchenwald. A further 8,000 Jews were evicted from Berlin: children from orphanages, patients from hospitals, old people from old people's homes. There were many suicides, 10 at least in Nuremburg, but it was forbidden to publish death notices in the press.

"It was not by the killing however, not by the arrests or the suicides, that the night of Nov. 9 was to be remembered. During the night, as well as breaking into tens of thousands of shops and homes, the Stormtroops set fire to 191 synagogues; or, if it was thought that fire might endanger nearby buildings, smashed the synagogues as thoroughly as possible with hammers and axes. The destruction of the synagogues led the Nazis to call that night the Kristallnacht, or night of broken glass: words chosen deliberately to mock and belittle."

It is important for us to recall that day. Seven years later, European Jewry would be almost entirely destroyed, and millions of men and women from the Allied fighting forces, underground and partisans would sacrifice their lives in a cruel, harsh war to defeat Kristallnacht's planners and executioners. Remembering, therefore, is a profound moral and existential debt we owe to the victims of the Shoah and to the vanquishers of the Nazis.

One of the most unsettling aspects of the terrorist war launched against Israel some three years ago, is the anti-Semitism that has resurfaced in Europe in its wake and that appears ubiquitous, alas, throughout the Muslim world. Indeed, in many respects, Muslim authorities have simply swallowed whole the crude anti-Semitism of Medieval Europe and are now spitting out the familiar, bitter bile at their own peoples.

Although some people today are very worried about the signs and images of anti-Semitism they see recurring from the last century, there is no parallel. But we are wise to view the events of 65 years ago as a warning, lest we become complacent.

Blames Sharon's policies

As a lifelong Zionist who has studied the negotiations between the Palestinians and the Israelis, I have come to the conclusion that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is bending over backward to avoid a fair negotiated settlement. It appears that he and his Likud government are looking for at least a partial surrender with the full support of the right wing U.S. government. As former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin cried, "Enough killing." He was silenced by a virulent, right-wing, power hungry gang of sophisticated thugs.

On both sides, everyone but a few mad politicians and religious zealots wants peace.

Our elderly parents

In the same issue that Rabbi Gunther Plaut writes about aging and respect ("The oldest prejudice," CJN, Oct. 16), there is an advertisement for a lecture on the new book Parenting Your Parent: The Latest, Greatest Challenge for Boomers.

If anything, this title demeans older people and shows a lack of respect. It is an obstacle to preserving their dignity at a most crucial time. Not only does this title portray the elderly in a negative light, it places the adult child in a difficult position.

The stage in life where children need to help their parents has been referred to as "filial maturity." There can never be a return to the parent/child relationship. "Parenting Your Parent" hearkens back to a stereotype that infantilizes elderly parents.

Filial maturity is a stage in all of our lives when we are called upon to assist, aid, comfort and at all times preserve the nature of the parent/child relationship. Deep inside the soul of a parent who may suffer from the deterioration of his or her mental faculties, there are glimmers of that relationship. I know this from my professional experience in geriatrics.

Health-care professionals specializing in geriatrics must help children connect with their parents, rather than cast their parental role aside.

Israel's humanitarianism unnoticed

The world is riveted by the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. However, while the world is preoccupied with examining Israel through a microscopic lens, their humanitarian outreach programs go unnoticed.

On Oct. 31, a team of 16 Israeli heart specialists arrived in northern China to help children with heart defects. It was the doctors' fifth visit to China since 1998. These surgeons are representatives of an Israeli humanitarian project called "Save A Child's Heart," and have performed surgery on about 50 patients to date, including two who were brought to Israel for their procedures. Initiated by the late Dr. Amram Cohen, Save A Child's Heart is the world's largest humanitarian project providing pediatric heart surgery and follow-up care.

This is just one of the many humanitarian endeavours Israel is engaged in. Israelis are also active in earthquake emergency assistance and agricultural instruction to developing nations. It is time Israel received long overdue recognition for its disproportionate contributions to humanity.

We had an amazing time

Having just returned from our second holiday in Israel in 10 months, we want to express our sadness about Canadian and American Jews who appear to have abandoned our brethren in Israel.

We had an amazing time on our trip. We felt secure and went everywhere. The clubs and restaurants were packed. You actually need reservations, but the patrons are all Israelis. Each Friday afternoon in Tel Aviv on Nahalot Benjamin Street, there is an arts and crafts show. Thousands of Israelis walk with their families on the street. The shuk was packed shoulder to shoulder. On Shabbat, the beach was packed and coffee houses jammed. We were asked regularly by strangers why were we there. When we responded we were on holiday, most people asked if we were afraid. Many told us they feel the Diaspora has abandoned them. Everywhere we went, we sensed a frustration with the situation and a concern that too many young soldiers were defending a few in the settlements. We also sensed a willingness to do anything for peace. We were overwhelmed by the strength of these Israelis.

We urge you to consider Israel as a vacation spot. You won't be disappointed. We never felt so proud of our religion, our people and our heritage. We went to the Western Wall and prayed for peace and for our family. We felt great happiness and pride.

We are now planning our next Israeli vacation, this one for after Passover. We urge your readers to consider spending "Next Year in Jerusalem."

As a Jew, I wish to publicly thank Malaysian Prime Minister Mahatir Mohamad for bringing to light the fact my people "rule the world by proxy."

This news came as a quite a shock to me, since I can barely control what goes on in my home and office.

It is a testimony to the incredible ingenuity of the Jews that, to disguise our true power, we have conspired with our proxies to have whole groups of ourselves massacred at regular intervals, culminating in the "Final Solution," ostensibly conceived by the Nazis, but really a Jewish diversion. And, as Mahatir pointed out, we also invented human rights and democracy just to deflect attention from our true intentions.

The standing ovation at the end of Mahatir's speech from Saudi Arabian Crown Prince Abdullah, Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf and Indonesian President Megawati Sukarnoputri should not be regarded as anti-Semitic, because those people are undoubtedly among our proxies too.

I have but one request for Mahatir, and that is to please send me my share of the spoils of world control, as my cohorts in world domination seem to have left me out of the loop.

Pope Pius XII and the Holocaust

By MURRAY TEITEL

This past July, the Vatican issued a warning to Catholic politicians that support for same-sex marriage was "gravely immoral." It stated that homosexual acts go against natural moral law. A bishop in Calgary actually warned Prime Minister Jean Chrétien that if he supported same-sex unions, he would be putting his personal salvation in peril.

During World War II, by contrast, the Vatican issued no public statement calling the systematic murder of Jews and others gravely immoral or contrary to natural moral law. No one warned Adolf Hitler, Joseph Goebbels or the other Catholics in the Nazi leadership that they were imperiling their salvations, nor were they ever excommunicated.

This article will attempt to briefly answer the following questions:

- What did Eugenio Pacelli – Pope Pius XII from March 2, 1939 to Oct. 9, 1958 – know about the Final Solution and when did he know it?
- Why did he not publicly condemn it?
- Would doing so have made a difference?

The first question is the easiest to answer. Pope Pius XII knew about the attempt to annihilate European Jewry shortly after it began. His forte was international politics. He had been cardinal secretary of state since Feb. 7, 1930, with responsibility for foreign policy and state relations. His predecessor, plagued by illness, relied on him heavily.

The Wannsee Conference, at which the plan for the genocide of European Jewry was revealed, did not take place until Jan. 20, 1942. But by then, the deportations that had been taking place and the mobile killing squads that had been operating for months were known and documented.

In the beginning of 1941, Cardinal Theodor Innitzer of Vienna told Pope Pius XII about the deportations from his country. Deportations, of course, are not genocide. But on Oct. 27, 1941, Giuseppi Burzio, papal nuncio to Slovakia, reported mass shootings of Jews in areas conquered from the Soviet Union. British code breakers, probably the first to know, had only found out in September. On March 9, 1942, Burzio said the deportation of 80,000 Slovak Jews to Poland meant certain death for them.

Pope Pius XII

On Oct. 22, 1941, both a Swedish newspaper, Socialdemokraten, and the Jewish Telegraphic Agency carried reports of the premeditated mass murder of Jews. The Socialdemokraten report, which mentioned Adolf Eichmann by name, was picked up by a London German-language paper, which accurately reported on Nov. 25 that 52,000 men women and children had been put to death in Kiev "by merciless systematic extermination." By this time, half a million Jews had been killed.

More than two months after the Wannsee Conference, in April 1942, the Sunday Times in London reported on the murder of 120,000 Romanian Jews. On June 2, the BBC broadcast an estimate of 700,000 Jews killed, a number repeated by the Daily Telegraph on June 25. Five days later, the Telegraph's headline read "More than 1,000,000 Jews killed in Europe" (a roughly accurate figure). These reports were picked up by the New York Times, although not given front-page prominence. And on June 9, Gen. Wladyslaw Sikorski, head of the Polish parliament in exile, stated on the BBC that the Jewish population of Poland was doomed to extinction. By that time, it was apparent to the average westerner following the news that this was not the usual pogrom-like persecution of Jews, but rather a program of total extinction.

In September 1942, Myron C. Taylor, then-U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt's personal emissary to the Vatican, along with Vatican representatives from several other countries, requested that the pope condemn these "incredible horrors." He refused.

On Dec. 17, the Allies joined in a vigorous condemnation called the "German Policy of Extermination of the Jewish Race." Taylor's secretary, Harold Tittman, asked cardinal secretary of state Luigi Maglione whether the pope would make a similar condemnation, he was told that the pope could not denounce particular atrocities, only atrocities in general. In that year's Christmas message, the pope referred to, in obfuscatorily diplomatic language that mentioned neither Nazis nor Jews, "hundreds of thousands… who, without any fault on their part, sometimes only because of their nationality or race, have been consigned to death or a slow decline."

Various reasons have been offered for the Pope's silence.

His own officials cited the following reasons in the fall of 1942:

- The Pope needed to maintain neutrality so that he might be an effective mediator between the warring parties;
- It is important that papal pronouncements stand the test of time, suggesting the reports of genocide may have been wrong;
- He did not want the German people to blame him for contributing to their defeat; and
- The Pope feared that a protest would lead to reprisals against Jewish converts to Catholicism, who might otherwise not be deported.

The latter scenario is precisely what had just happened in Holland following a protest by the archbishop of Utrecht (Edith Stein – a Catholic convert from Judaism – was one of the deportees). On March 11, 1943, the wartime Berlin correspondent for the Vatican newspaper said the Pope had told him: "Dear friend, do not forget that millions of Catholics serve in the German armies. Shall I bring them into conflicts of conscience?" In other words, he was saying, "I wouldn't want German Nazis to leave the Church."

Historians cite evidence that the Pope viewed Communist atheism as a greater threat in the long run than Nazism and conclude that he did not want Russia to end up controlling large portions of Catholic Europe. Germany's victory on the Eastern Front would prevent that, as stated by Maglione in 1943.

Would a strong public papal condemnation combined with diplomatic efforts have made a difference? Most probably, since in each country Jews were deported from, the Nazis heavily depended on local authorities and other collaborators to actually round up and intern them. These collaborators, rather than being terrified functionaries, often displayed a good deal of enthusiasm and initiative. (The zealots in the Paris prefecture of police, for instance, developed a card index that listed Jews in no less than four different ways.) The Nazis had nowhere near enough manpower to do it on their own. The extent to which they received local co-operation or met with local resistance and rescue efforts profoundly affected their plans.

Having said that, however, it must be kept in mind that the factors at play in each country were unique. Geography, size and degree of assimilation of the Jewish population played a great part. Countries such as Bulgaria, Finland and Italy, which was ruled by Hitler's ally Benito Mussolini, successfully resisted Nazi demands to surrender Jews (though Bulgaria deported Jews from newly conquered Thrace and Macedonia). Denmark's celebrated transfer of 7,906 Jews to Sweden occured in a country that was allowed to remain self-governing, and the operation was set in motion by Nazi minister and plenipotentiary, Werner Best. Holland – occupied, flat and lacking in forest cover – lost 105,000 of the 140,000 people who met the Nazi definition of "Jew," despite examples of heroic civil disobedience.

Take France as an example, where the local police were the ones who rounded up the Jews. After its defeat in June 1940, France was divided into an occupied north and a self- governing south. The latter was known as the Vichy regime and was headed by the arch-conservative Marshal Pétain. Between 1940 and June 1941, it enacted a series of anti-Jewish statutes that French cardinals and archbishops disapproved of. So Catholic was the regime that Pétain asked Leon Berard, his ambassador to the Vatican, to ascertain its view of these laws. "They have no intention of quarreling with us over the Jewish statute," he reported. The Vatican's only objection was that the laws not apply to Jews who had converted to Christianity.

The Vatican reacted the same way to the racial laws introduced by Mussolini in 1938. This is not surprising given that the Catholic church of the time was institutionally anti-Semitic. La Civilta Catholica, a Jesuit publication that functioned as the unofficial mouthpiece of papal views, noted in 1934 with regret that Nazi anti-Semitism did not stem from religious conviction, but a desire to upset the order of religion and society. In 1936, it argued that the civil rights of Jews should be suspended and they should be returned to the ghettos. The Church disagreed with the racial basis of Nazi anti-Semitism, since it would not discriminate against converts to Catholicism and it certainly would not sanction the murder of Jews, believing that the solution to the Jewish problem was their conversion.

Had the pope publicly declared that Jews were being rounded up and sent to their deaths and that assisting in this process was a sin, and had he asked monasteries and convents to provide refuge to fleeing Jews, Vichy might have shown more backbone in resisting German demands as it did on other issues such as German use of its southern naval bases. Instead, it actually volunteered to round up foreign Jews found in the unoccupied zone. Moreover, some of the tens of thousands of Frenchmen who denounced or carried out the minutiae of the transports might not have participated, or participated less energetically, resulting in the possibility that many of the 75,721 deported in 79 convoys from France – a quarter of French Jewry – might have survived.

The best proof of this theory lies in the numbers: between March 27 and Dec. 31, 1942, 41,911 Jews had been deported from France, but three months later, the figure was only 7,995 higher. What had slowed the process? The allies had landed in North Africa on Feb. 2 and Germany was defeated at Stalingrad. You didn't need to be a military genius to figure out that Germany would lose. The French, accordingly, stopped co-operating and some Vichy functionaries even joined the Resistance, former president Francois Mitterand among them. It was the same story across Europe. If you factor out Hungarian Jewry, whose destruction began in late April 1944, the vast majority of Jewish Holocaust victims were killed between January 1942 and February 1943.

In Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, a small, otherwise insignificant Protestant village in the Haute Loire in southern France, 5,000 villagers saved 5,000 Jews. Week after week, their pastor, Andre Trocme, spoke out in every sermon he delivered when not under detention. In Denmark, the synod of the Lutheran Church issued a formal statement in support of the Jews, as did the Bulgarian Orthodox Church.

No such moral leadership came from the Vatican. Politics as usual prevailed over the teachings of the gospels. An institution that today pulls out all the stops to prevent same-sex marriage made no public pronouncement while the greatest crime in human history was taking place. As Pastor Trocme preached: "The Christian Church should fall to its knees and beg pardon of God for its present incapacity and cowardice."

The importance of life events

Sooner or later, all of us have days in our lives that we consider special. Oct. 27 turned out to be special for me and left a good memory. For that evening, I attended a gala affair at the Sheraton Centre Toronto Hotel that focused on an organization dear to me since my youthful days in Germany in the 1920s and 1930s.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The event, attended by hundreds of people, celebrated Maccabi, the worldwide organization devoted to the development of Jewish sports.

The roots of the Maccabi movement go back to before 1895, with the establishment of the first Israel Gymnastics Club in Constantinople, Turkey. The movement quickly spread to other parts of Europe. The Maccabi World Union was formed in 1921 during the 12th Zionist Congress in Carlsbad.

Although Jewish athletic competitions took place in several cities prior to that time, the first Maccabiah Games were held in 1932 and 1935 in British Mandatory Palestine. They were suspended during World War II and resumed in 1950.

Following the example of the Olympic Games, the Maccabiah is now celebrated every four years.

It was my privilege to attend a Maccabiah as a competitor in track and field twice in my life, and both times it was an unforgettable experience.

There was a time, quite a few decades ago, when all physical sports were considered "goyish" by many of our people, but fortunately that time is long gone. We know today that the physical and spiritual realms do not necessarily contradict one another, but rather, at their best, support each other. Though it took some time before we reached this understanding, every one of our people takes this for granted today.

A Maccabiah is nowadays a worldwide Jewish event, and if any of you, my readers, have the opportunity to be in Israel for the occasion, you will always remember it as a highlight of your lives. Which leads me to share with you a special worry: television has become an overwhelming force in our lives. For many, if not most of us, TV is an ever-present influence that all too frequently replaces the event it shows to its viewers. To give an obvious example: a trip to Eretz Yisrael was formerly a featured event in our lives. Today, as we watch TV, we may subconsciously yield to the illusion that we already know enough about the land so that the trip is not really necessary.

I urge you, dear reader, not to yield to this misconception. For while TV can present an image, it cannot replace reality. Do start thinking about such a journey, and call your nearest Zionist organization for information about financial and other assistance.

In the hope that you will consider this seriously, I wish all of you chizku v'imtsu. Be strong, and may your strength increase!

On Jewish identity, representing the Holocaust

I was kind of ticked off after I saw Theatre Calgary's rendition of The Diary of Anne Frank recently.

The lead actor chosen to play Anne Frank was a simpering blue-eyed blonde with distinctly Scandinavian features. She was about as Jewish-looking as I am Chinese.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

Notwithstanding the fact that her physical portrayal was hardly convincing, her acting wasn't believable either. I'm not sure if casting her was supposed to be politically correct, but I don't think it was a wise choice for such a widely recognizable icon whose fame has reached almost pop-culture proportions.

Of course, it's easy to fall into the trap of describing all Jews in terms of a certain physical stereotype, which would be far from the truth.

There are Jews living all over the world – in China and India and even Ethiopia – who bear distinct resemblance to their neighbours in both skin colour and facial features.

It seems that determining one's identity as a Jew is the perpetual million-dollar question – something that confuses us as well as others.

I went to an interesting lecture on campus recently about the 2002 Nobel laureate for literature, Imre Kertesz, that also explored the concept of Jewish identity, particularly as others perceive it.

Adrienne Kertzer, a humanities professor at the University of Calgary, delivered the lecture on this somewhat obscure author and Holocaust survivor – the only survivor to ever win the Nobel Prize for literature (Elie Wiesel won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986).

Born in Budapest in 1929, Kertesz was deported to Auschwitz in 1944 and later to Buchenwald, where he was liberated in 1945.

Because Kertesz writes in Hungarian and only two of his 11 books have been translated into English, access to his work has always been limited for English readers. Kertesz's work is thus not often the subject of scholarship on the Holocaust, especially in North America.

When he received the Nobel Prize, most of the world greeted the news with "bewilderment and snide comments about how once again the Swedish Academy had chosen a writer whom no one had heard of," Kertzer said.

This was further demonstrated through subsequent newspaper coverage that often focused on analyzing the motivation behind the Swedish Academy's choice of Kertesz rather than on exploring the quality or symbolism of his prose.

The Swedish Academy has praised Kertesz for the exemplary nature of his writing and the universality of what he is able to derive from his experiences in Auschwitz and at Buchenwald.

But newspaper articles have speculated that he received the Nobel Prize because of his identity as one or all of the following: a Jew, a Hungarian, a European and a Holocaust survivor who also survived Communist Hungary.

"To draw a distinction between writing as a European and writing as a Jew is troubling, not just because it challenges those who regard Kertesz's Nobel Prize as a gesture by the Swedish Academy to signal its disapproval of the recent disturbing increase of anti-Semitic incidents in Europe," Kertzer said.

"The academy applauds Kertesz for treating the Holocaust as neither unique nor exceptional, but as part of European history, and gives him the prize because in his writing he finds the ultimate truth about human degradation in modern existence."

Kertzer also discussed both of Kertesz's novels that have been translated into English, identifying similarities as well as differences between the narrators of his novels and Kertesz's own life experiences.

But the main thread throughout all of Kertesz's works is something that he explores repeatedly, Kertzer said.

"The problem of representing the Holocaust lies neither in the limitations nor in the inexplicability of evil," said Kertzer. "The problem is that we do not want to accept that evil is explicable."

For some reason, that point really hit home with me.

When you look at it that way – in terms of the larger issues raised in the play – the colour of an actor's hair doesn't matter very much. Yet, if you stop to think about it, because of the magnitude of evil being portrayed and the need to make sure it never arises again, historical accuracy actually does matter.

Why can't we all just get along?

One Jew, two opinions: the phrase rolls off the tongue easily because we have all heard it before, but more importantly, because we know it's true. There is something about the Jewish community, and Jews in general – no matter what the issue, we divide ourselves while covering every ideological possibility.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

The extent this challenge poses is made apparent in every attempt to plan events for Jewish students on campus. Inclusivity is the goal, but is there a way it can really be achieved?

First, we have to reconcile the standard Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, and Reconstructionist divisions. The tendency is to yield to those who are most observant of Halachah, thus ensuring that everyone can participate. But this ignores the fact that each religious stream has its own beliefs and practices, and by making such a "choice," we are automatically making value judgments. While anyone can eat a kosher meal, not everyone will agree about what prayers should be said and what protocol should be observed while saying them.

In large Jewish communities, numbers have allowed us to divide ourselves according to our beliefs. Each Conservative shul, for example, seems to target a specific niche. Even beyond religious differences, we establish groups and organizations to address a variety of issues. When we don't find an organization or community that suits our needs, we seem to feel justified in attempting to create something new that does.

On campuses across the country, there is a full gamut of organizations. Hillels and Jewish student associations don't meet the needs of all students, so there are fraternities and Zionist organizations, in addition to religious student groups. Of course, it is important for people to find institutions they feel comfortable participating in – and in large communities, it can often be more effective to diversify in such a way. But at the same time, we can't lose sight of the importance of retaining a semblance of a single, unified Jewish community. There must be some common denominator upon which we can all stand together.

It is very easy for us to accept our differences as insurmountable barriers. The Orthodox and the Reconstructionist may not be able to pray together, but we cannot allow that to be an excuse for them to hide in two separate worlds. We cannot hide behind our institutions in order to escape the necessity of communicating with those who think differently from ourselves. We so often assume we understand divergent point of views, but we rarely take the time to be sure that we actually do.

As I write this column, the first-ever Atlantic Jewish Film Festival has just closed in Halifax. The festival emerged from the hard work of a group of devoted community members who wanted to escape the traditional divisions of a small community and its politics. People in Halifax had the opportunity to view films on everything from Jewish homosexuality and women and the mikvah to Yiddish culture and satires of contemporary Jewish culture.

Of course, there were debates and complaints and people disagreed about what was appropriate. But a social equalizer like film was able to transcend, at least on some level, the normal tensions of a small community. Freed from the usual debate as to which shul should hold a community event or how to accommodate religious and political sentiments in a just and amenable way, the festival made an entire community look at different, less typical questions.

A strong community is one that can accommodate differences and make room for multiple views. At the same time, we must prevent our differences from dividing us. We have to transcend our disagreements and remember that at the root of it all, we are one community.

The Jews of India go back a long way

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

On a train in northern India last year, I sat next to a young Hindu man, an articulate and well-informed 20-year-old engineering student. As we talked, the arid landscape of Rajasthan whizzing past us, the subject of our conversation turned to the recent inter-communal disturbances in the north-western state of Gujarat during which hundreds of Muslims and Hindus had been killed.

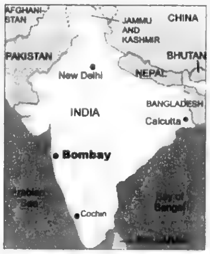
They were the worst such riots in a decade, calling into question India's proud claim of being a country where various religious groups co-exist in blissful harmony. When I observed that India's Jews had not been caught up in this tragedy, he looked at me in puzzlement and said authoritatively, "There are no Jews in India."

His reaction was not surprising. India, after China, is the most populous nation on the planet. Among a population of one billion and counting, India's 5,000 Jews hardly make an impression. Even though the first Jews arrived in India about 2,000 years ago, they were submerged in terms of their visibility by India's other much larger minority groups, the Christians and the Zoroastrians.

These thoughts came to mind as I read Who are the Jews of India? (University of California Press) by Nathan Katz. The chair of religious studies at Florida International University in Miami, Katz has written a book that sheds light on one of the few Jewish communities that has been spared the spectre of state anti-Semitism.

In this respect, Indian Jews have reaped the benefits of India's secular democracy. Never have they been the targets of pogroms, like Hindus, Muslims or Sikhs, and never have they felt the sting of victimization.

There are three distinct Jewish communities on the Indian sub-continent: the Bene Israel of greater Bombay, the Cochin Jews of the Malabar coast and the Baghdadi Jews of Calcutta and Bombay.



"Jews navigated the shoals of Indian culture very well," Katz writes in this informative volume. "They never experienced anti-Semitism or discrimination at Indian hands. They contributed to Indian civilization in a variety of secular arts, in medicine, commerce and industry, in cinema, politics and agriculture and in the military."

The Bene Israel, who comprise the majority of Indian Jewry today, are the descendants of Jews from ancient Israel who were shipwrecked on the Indian Ocean coast.

By Katz's estimate, the European world first heard of the Bene Israel in the 18th century. As a Dutch Jewish traveller observed: "They live in tents, they own oil presses. Some of them are soldiers. They know nothing as regards their faith except to recite the Shema and rest on the Sabbath."

Some years earlier, a Danish missionary wrote: "They have not the books of the Old Testament, nor do they understand Hebrew… They wear turbans, a long dress reaching to their feet and long trousers, just as the Mohammedans. They do not intermarry with other Indians, but keep to their own people."

Katz believes that Christian missionaries inadvertently reinforced the Bene Israel's allegiance to Judaism. Hopeful of converting them, they translated the Old Testament into Marathi and taught them Hebrew and English. As soon as they mastered Hebrew, the Bene Israel translated Hebrew prayers into Marathi. As for English, it became their passport to the modern world and to Jews elsewhere.

Emulating the Indian caste system, the Bene Israel divided themselves into two subcastes: white and black. The whites were said to be the offspring of the original shipwrecked Jews. The blacks were stigmatized as the descendants of whites and low-caste Hindus.

The Bene Israel, 90 per cent of whom immigrated to Israel, established their first synagogue in Bombay in 1796. As synagogues became the focal points of Bene Israel communities, they adopted what Katz calls "mainstream Judaism," which they learned from Cochin Jews.

Like the Bene Israel, the Cochins arrived in India centuries ago, being welcomed as merchants. In the late 1400s, however, Portuguese explorers brought with them a spirit of intolerance, and an Office of the Inquisition was established in Goa.

Despite the Portuguese presence, Cochin Jews were allowed to build a synagogue in 1568. It remains the oldest shul in the British Commonwealth and is a popular tourist destination.

The arrival of the Dutch in the 17th century heralded a golden age for Jews, and Katz elaborates on this period.

With the arrival of the British in 1797, the community declined. Since the town of Cochin was not officially a part of British India, its economic importance was superseded by Bombay and Calcutta.

The Jews of Cochin, who were generally spice merchants, petty traders, government officials, farmers and soldiers, formed close ties with the Nayars, the dominant caste in Kerala. And like the Bene Israel, they developed their own peculiar caste system.

Jews and Nayar maharajahs were mutually dependent on each other. Jews enjoyed the hospitality and protection of the maharajah. In return, Jews provided the maharajahs with soldiers and commercial contacts beyond India's shores.

A Bene Israel couple, 1902.

By royal invitation, Cochin Jews built their synagogue next to the maharajah's palace.

Baghdadi Jews, originally from Iraq, Syria, Yemen, Iran and Tunisia, trickled into India as traders before and after the 18th century.

They traded in agricultural products, including opium, "a source of many Jewish fortunes," as Katz puts it.

Jewish merchants bought chests of opium at government auctions and shipped them to members of their extended families in Penang, Singapore, Hong Kong and Shanghai.

By the time China succeeded in banning opium trafficking in the early 20th century, Baghdadi Jews, such as the Sassoons of Bombay – the Rothschilds of the East – and the Ezras of Calcutta, had switched to textiles, real estate and manufacturing.

The Sassoons dominated Bombay as no other Jewish family in India.

The eight sons of the Sassoon patriarch, David (1792-1864), expanded their empire, sinking mercantile roots in Japan, China, Iraq, Holland, Britain and the United States.

Like the Tatas, the fabulously wealthy Hindu clan, the Sassoons were instrumental in industrializing India. David's son, Abdullah, also known as Albert, built Bombay's shipping docks, erected statues and became a leading government advisor.

After the 1857 mutiny, the Indian insurrection against British colonialism, the Baghdadis gradually distanced themselves from the indigenous population and embraced all things British.

And yet, as Katz observes, they were often banned from exclusive European clubs.

In closing, Katz claims that Jews in India have always enjoyed the respect, if not the affection, of their Hindu, Muslim and Christian neighbours.

Be that as it may, the contemporary Jewish community in India is but a pale shadow of its former self, having been emasculated by emigration, mainly to Israel.

Of the three strands of Indian Jewry, only the Bene Israel remain vital.

Jews are but a thin thread on the fabric of India's rich ethnic and religious tapestry. But as the student I met on the train may learn one day, the Jews of India, though demographically diminished, are alive and well.

Hungarian officials delivered Jews to Nazis, expert says

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

It was the greatest crime within the greatest crime.

The Jews of Hungary were relatively safe, even oblivious, until late in World War II, and then they were subjected to the most brutal treatment in the shortest time span.

In just eight weeks – from May 15, 1944 to July 9, 1944 – close to 440,000 Hungarian Jews were deported to Auschwitz. It was the highest concentration of deportations in Europe.

"It was at a rate that not even the crematoria could absorb," the foremost chronicler of the Holocaust in Hungary said last week as part of Holocaust Education Week.

How was it all possible? Prof. Randolph Braham, author of the definitive two-volume work The Politics of Genocide: The Holocaust in Hungary, is the rare academic who is not completely kind to the Hungarian Jewish leadership of the day.

"The ultimate blame must rest on the Germans and their Hungarian accomplices," Braham, a retired professor at the City University of New York, told a gathering at the University of Toronto. "But it was also possible because many leaders, Jews and non-Jews, were guided by illusions."

The Jews of Hungary were relatively unscathed until 1944, "completely oblivious to the fate of their brethren in other countries. No one believed Hungarian Jews would be subject to the same fate as those elsewhere in Europe," said Braham, the author or editor of more than 50 books.

Even when the secrets of Auschwitz began leaking out to Jewish leaders, Hungarian Jews "behaved no differently than those in Poland," he said.

Hungary's pre-war Jewish population of roughly 400,000 nearly doubled thanks to territory the country was awarded or acquired. These Jews, Braham explained, were, for the most part, assimilated, acculturated and patriotic – often even more loyal to Hungary than native Magyars.

The community, he said, became "increasingly confident" due in some measure to the fact that its relationship with the government and non-Jewish establishment had for decades been "symbiotic and not antagonistic."

That's not to say life for Hungarian Jews was easy prior to 1944. Close to 60,000 had died in forced labour battalions. But Hungary, an ally of Nazi Germany during the war, wanted to emulate Italy and withdraw from the fighting, Braham said. The results were "a tragicomic opera."

Adolf Hitler refused Hungary's wishes and Nazi troops occupied the country on March 19, 1944. "It was a military decision to occupy Hungary, so it would not surrender," Braham said. "The Jewish question was not a determining factor."

In fact, the Germans weren't certain that Hungary would give up its Jews easily. But after the occupation, Hungarian officials "outdid" the Nazis in their eagerness to co-operate with the Final Solution. They offered up 18,000 Jews a day, which even the Nazis found too much. A "compromise" of 12,000 a day was eventually reached.

"The Germans would have been helpless without the co-operation of Hungarian officials," Braham said. With the combined effort, Jews "were fundamentally hapless and unprepared. Jewish leaders knew about Auschwitz, but failed to inform the masses."

By July 1944, almost all of the Hungarian countryside was declared Judenrein (free of Jews). All that remained were the 150,000 or so Jews of Budapest, who survived only thanks to the advancing Red Army and the heroic exploits of Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg, who issued fake passports to Jews.

Braham noted that Pope Pius XII sent a letter to German officials protesting the treatment of Hungarian Jews, but not one Hungarian church issued a pastoral letter on the subject.

Holocaust education growing in Europe: Imber

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Five years ago, the government of Sweden commissioned a research study, the results of which left Swedish officials frightened.

Researchers polling the country's young people found that many 12- to 15-year-olds belonged to neo-Nazi gangs and knew next to nothing about the Holocaust.

What's more, many did not think democracy was all that important. The appearance in city streets of the young gangs "terrified people," but it was a phenomenon that was happening elsewhere in Europe as well, said Shulamit Imber, pedagogical director of the International School for Holocaust Studies at Yad Vashem.

The Swedes concluded the polling results were a consequence of not confronting the past head on. Their response was to place great emphasis on teaching about the Holocaust.

"Learning the Holocaust is very active around Europe," promoted by education ministries and non-governmental organizations, Imber said.

Imber, who serves on the International Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, was speaking last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation as part of Holocaust Education Week. The event was sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem in partnership with the Chenstochover Society.

Imber said the current European interest in the Holocaust is a marked departure from previous years. Western countries, she said, did not really address the Holocaust until the last years of the 20th century. For 45 years, it was ignored in school curricula, and even people studying World War II could do so without reference to the murder of Jews.

Today, European countries commemorate the Holocaust and teach about it "as a way of meeting and confronting the past."

The effort comes up against substantial obstacles, she continued. A German friend told her that "it's not easy to confront your past. It's admitting your parents and grandparents were either perpetrators or bystanders."

Some get around the problem by expanding Holocaust curricula to focus on the Nazi totalitarian state, racism, rescuers and concentration camps, while avoiding the discussion of death camps where Jews were killed en masse, Imber said.

Some educators compare the Holocaust to modern-day conflicts, such as those in Rwanda and Kosovo, labeling them all "holocausts" and even saying "the real Holocaust is what the Jews do to Palestinians," she said.

Yad Vashem counters that trend by participating in as many educational conferences and meetings as it can and by bringing the focus back to the German genocide of Jews, Imber said.

Many who accuse Israel of committing a holocaust are not even familiar with the details of the Nazi genocide, she said. Educators "must explain and define it" by reminding them it meant the Nazi plan to gather every person with one Jewish grandparent and transport them to their deaths.

Before applying lessons of the Holocaust to contemporary racism, first people need to understand the facts of the Holocaust, she added.

In earlier remarks, Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, described current manifestations of anti-Semitism in Canada.

In one example, Farber referred to a Grade 10 student who e-mailed Ingrid Rimland, Ernst Zundel's wife and Web master, asking for information about Zundel and his views. She said she needed the material for a school mock trial, and she later told Rimland that her exposition of Zundel's views, based not only on opinion but "on real fact," helped her win the trial.

Farber said campuses are a focal point for anti-Semitic incidents. A sukkah at York University was knocked down twice during the recent Sukkot holiday and U.S. academic Daniel Pipes was nearly prevented from speaking at the university by physical threats, while in Vancouver, Hillel was prevented from presenting an Israeli Arab to speak on multiculturalism because he had served in the Israeli army.

Farber also said he had heard the chant, in Arabic, of "death to the Jews," during a protest outside the Israeli consulate in Toronto.

The Jewish community, he said, must take anti-Semitism seriously. The extreme right and the extreme left have found common ground in their hatred of Israel and Jews, and "anti-Zionism has become the blood brother of anti-Semitism."

"Islamism," the extremist political manifestation of Islam that features a totalitarian political ideology modelled on Nazism and Communism, has adopted anti-Semitic views, Farber said. Quoting his colleague Manuel Prutschi, he said these groups share the goal of making the world free of a Jewish state.

Farber urged listeners to actively respond to these trends by calling radio phone-in shows, writing letters to the editor and educating as many people as possible about anti-Semitism.

Jewish genealogy and the Holocaust

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots
&
Remembrance

Tombstone carvers often symbolically represent a life cut tragically short, as when a child dies, with a cemetery monument in the shape of a truncated tree trunk.

The motif is also sometimes used among Jewish genealogists when drawing charts of families cut down in the Shoah. Shoots are shown growing from the severed trunk when a branch of the family survived into the postwar era.

Genealogists who focus on Holocaust research often feel a strong need to retrieve the names and identities of relatives who perished. As the late philosopher Emil Fackenheim famously observed, we are commanded not to hand a posthumous victory to Hitler by forgetting. Thus, genealogy becomes a mission, not just a hobby.

Over the last decade, the myth that all Jewish records were destroyed when the Jewish communities were wiped out has given way to the realization that many wartime records still exist. The Germans excelled at keeping paper records, and much source material has also been generated by survivors and others. The following is a sampling of resources.

Yad Vashem, the Jerusalem-based Holocaust museum has collected "Pages of Testimony" from survivors and their families for nearly half a century, and it has amassed between two and three million distinct names of the six million who perished. Each page details names of parents, spouse and children, birth and death dates and places, as well as information about the submitter.

Yad Vashem is still perfecting a system to make the pages accessible on the Internet. In the meantime, write to P.O. Box 3477, 91034 Jerusalem, Israel. Yad Vashem's microfilmed records from the International Tracing Service of the International Red Cross are also useful. Its Web site is www.yad-vashem.org.il.

Archives at Auschwitz, Warsaw Ghetto and other Holocaust-related sites may have files on inmates or residents. The Gedenkbuch (Koblenz, 1986) gives the names of 128,000 German Jews who perished, while the Memorial to the Jews Deported from France (Serge Klarsfeld, 1983) lists 70,000 Jews deported from France to concentration camps. A companion volume exists for Belgium. Some years ago, a group of survivors published a five-volume list of about 130,000 residents of the former Lodz Ghetto.The University of Toronto's Robarts Library is one of about 10 institutions worldwide to have a copy.

Like the Jewish Public Library in Montreal and numerous American university libraries, Robarts also has an excellent collection of yizkor books. Once dismissed by an eminent scholar as "tombstones, not books," yizkor books are published histories of Jewish communities in Eastern Europe and Russia that each memorialize a town or region and its martyrs. More than 800 have been published. They typically offer descriptions, usually in Hebrew and/or Yiddish, of the town's history, culture, institutions and rabbis, as well as a necrology of Holocaust victims.

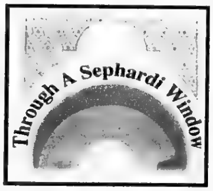
From A Ruined Garden: The Memorial Books of Polish Jewry (edited by Jack Kugelmass and Jonathan Boyarin) offers about 60 excerpts in translation. For other excerpts, see the Yizkor Book Registry of JewishGen (www.jewishgen.org). The Encyclopedia Judaica offers good thumbnail sketches of many destroyed Jewish communities, while a growing library of Holocaust memoirs and the Spielberg Foundation's videotaped interviews with survivors are also important resources.

The U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington (202-488-0400, www.ushmm.org) has an extensive library and archives of Holocaust research material. The museum also maintains the Registry of Jewish Holocaust Survivors, a listing of more than 170,000 survivors and their children in the United States and Canada.

These are just some of the growing number of resources available. For more detailed summaries, see Gary Mokotoff's How to Document Victims and Locate Survivors of the Holocaust (Avotaynu, 1995), or visit the JewishGen Web site, www.jewishgen.org.

What's in a name?

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON



One of the tasks of Adam, the first human, while in the Garden of Eden, was to give appropriate names to the animals in his kingdom. Adam was a man whose vision enabled him to perceive the essence of each species, and with this wisdom, he was also able to formulate a name that would capture each animal's essence.

This idea that a name is much more than a convenience, that it is rather a description – an identification – of a thing's very being, is a recurring theme in the Torah. Over and over, we see that the biblical names of people express their very individuality and personality. A name, then, is very much like a blueprint, which conveys the form a building is to take.

While we certainly do not have the perception of Adam, nor his descriptive powers in deciding on names, we believe nevertheless that a person's name has cosmic effects on their personality and fortunes. Hence, to this day, we prefer to name our children with the names of those we wish them to emulate. What greater way to perpetuate the memory of another than by giving their name to a child in the hope the child will grow not just into the name but into a reflection of the person's personality.

From Creation until the Middle Ages, it was most common to bestow on one's children the names of those we wished them to imitate, dead or alive. It was not until the Middle Ages and the instructions of Rav Yehuda Hachasid that today's prevalent custom of not naming children after the living took hold.

But, in general, Sephardim did not accept Rav Yehuda's advice of not naming children after the living, and they continue to do so to this day.

The custom is that a family's first boy is given the name of his paternal grandfather, while a second boy is given the name of his maternal grandfather. Likewise, a first girl would be named after her paternal grandmother, and a second girl would be named after her maternal grandmother. After this, any names may be given.

It is also important to note that while it is always preferred to give one's children Hebrew names, certain non-Hebrew names have been adopted into the roster of Jewish names. These name usually reflect the original Hebrew name, such as Leon for Yehuda, Salvador for Yehoshua, Fortuna for Mazel.

One should not be surprised at how such Latin, Spanish and even Arabic names have been added to the roster of "Jewish" names, for there are countless Ashkenazi names that are considered bona fide Jewish monikers but are in fact of Germanic origin – including Mendel, Velvel, Baila, Faigel, Bluma. Just as these Germanic names have been accepted, words from the languages of Sephardi Jews have also been accepted.

(Incidentally, one of my peeves is hearing the ridiculous statement that Sephardi last names do not sound "Jewish." Rest assured that family names such as Rosensweig or Berkovitch betray their Germanic or Romanian origins and are no more Jewish then Buzaglo, Gozlan or Toledano, which reflect their Arabic or Spanish origin. Unless a name is in the category of Cohen or Levi and the like, all Jewish last names have their origins in the Diaspora.)

Recently, a new trend has developed in which non-Hebrew names have found their way back into the roster of Jewish names in translation, however loosely that translation into Hebrew may be. For example, the Arabic word for joy, Aisha becomes Simcha,or Jamilla – beautiful – becomes Yaffa. These names, like the people who bore them, travelled the Diaspora and are now safely back in their land and language.

Making Israel's case

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Case for Israel by Alan Dershowitz, John Wiley & Sons, $29.29.

This is an important and necessary book. It appears at a time when a recent poll in a Toronto newspaper indicated that a large majority of Canadians support the Palestinian cause. It is a brilliantly argued defence of Israel by a recognized champion of law, freedom and human rights. Dershowitz argues that Israel may not be perfect, but it is the sole outpost of liberty and democracy in the Middle East.

For Dershowitz, those who single out Israel for criticism while rarely directing it against other countries with far worse human rights records are guilty of nothing less then international bigotry.

In a recent interview, the author said, "I decided to write this book after witnessing the recent spate of unthinking attacks on Israel on so many college campuses around the United States and throughout the world. I was especially upset at the way so many academics responded to the recent suicide bombs that killed more than 800 Israelis, mostly civilians. These bombings were a carefully calculated attempt by Palestinian extremists to shift the blame away from [Palestinian Authority President] Yasser Arafat for walking away from the generous peace offer made by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak and former American president Bill Clinton at Camp David and Taba in 2001."

To those who ignore the facts – or, more likely, are ignorant of them – Dershowitz maintains that for decades, the Palestinian leadership has been more interested in there not being a Jewish state then in there being a Palestinian one.

In 1917, 1937 and 1948, and between 1948-1967, he points out, the Palestinians could have had a state, if they were prepared to recognize Israel's right to exist. Most recently, in 2000 and 2001, they could have had a state if they were prepared to stop the violence.

Dershowitz writes that the only realistic resolution of the Arab-Israel dispute is a two-state solution, long advocated by most Israelis: a predominantly Jewish state in what is now Israel, and a predominantly Muslim state on the West Bank and Gaza. The first and most important step toward this is for the Palestinian leadership to declare in Arabic, clearly and unmistakeably, that Israel has the right to exist.

Dershowitz challenges more than 30 accusations levelled against Israel and responds to each with cold, hard facts and documentation in Israel's defence. Some of the accusations are: the Zionist movement was a plot to colonize all of British Mandate Palestine; the UN Partition Plan was unfair to Palestinians; Israel create the Arab refugee problem; Israel started the Six-Day War; Israel has not made serious efforts at peace; Arafat was right in turning down the Barak-Clinton peace proposal; Israel tortures Palestinians; universities should divest from Israel and boycott Israeli scholars; and Israel is the "prime" human rights violator in the world.

Finally, Dershowitz makes clear that Hamas, Hezbollah and other rejectionist groups have vowed to continue terrorism even if the occupation were ended. He agrees with the conclusions of New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman, who wrote that Palestinians who use suicide bombers to blow up Israelis at a Passover meal and then declare, "Just end the occupation and everything will be fine" are not believable. No Israeli in his right mind would trust that Arafat, who has used suicide bombers to suit his purposes, would not do the same thing if he got the West Bank back and some of his people started demanding Tel Aviv.

I know of no better book than this which so lucidly, convincingly and effectively presents the case for Israel to exist as a secure nation.

Jewish book month, part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Looking for a good Jewish book to read? In honour of Jewish Book Month, I continue my survey of the best books sites on the Internet, with advice about everything from Jewish kids' literature to sacred texts to science fiction.

The best place to start is at JBooks.com, The Online Jewish Book Community. This large site has sections devoted to fiction, non-fiction, interviews and profiles, as well as children's books. The first chapters section gives you just that, an excerpt from a current book such as Ruchama King's Seven Blessings, in which she "explores the world of Orthodox matchmaking in Jerusalem and the lives of those looking for love."

JBooks.com's lively discussion forum invites you to comments on recent winners of the National Jewish Book Awards and on other books and authors in the news. And for the daring, you can even post your own fiction, poetry, or other creative writing and respond to other peoples' works [http://www.jbooks.com/].

Nextbook describes itself as "a gateway to Jewish literature, culture and ideas." Like JBooks.com, it critiques new Jewish books and presents reading lists. Its "Portraits of the Artists as a Young Person" list recommends autobiographies, essays and fictionalized memoirs by such authors as Oliver Sacks, David Grossman and Albert Einstein. Nextbook's excellent cultural news digest scours the Internet for articles of interest about Jewish books, film and museums and food appearing in major periodicals such as the New Yorker, the Forward and the Guardian. [http://www.nextbook.org/].

Need more suggestions? The Greater Cleveland chapter of the Association of Jewish Libraries has compiled a list of noteworthy titles for 2003/5764. It includes Haim Be'er's The Pure Element of Time, "a fictionalized memoir of the childhood and literary development of one of Israel's foremost talents," and Ari Goldman's Living a Year of Kaddish [http://www.jewishlibraries.org/].

The Association of Jewish Libraries has also compiled a similar list of titles for children. But it has gone a step further with its New Jewish Valuesfinder Web site. This searchable database emphasizes books that promote moral qualities and good deeds. As with most book-related search engines, you can look for titles by author, title or ISBN number. But what sets this search engine apart is its ability to also search for books that emphasize values such as social activism, compassion, honoring the aged and love for Torah [http://www.ajljewishvalues.org/].

What do Woody Allen, S.Y. Agnon and Isaac Asimov have in common? Their works all appear on Steven Silver's Jewish Science Fiction and Fantasy reading list. Silver has included almost 400 titles from Jewish and non-Jewish authors: Isaac Bashevis Singer (The Golem), Harlan Ellison (I'm Looking for Kadak) and Miriam Baskin (My Clone and I from Jewish Sci Fi Stories for Children). Do you have a qualm with Steven Singer's choices or do you have some titles you'd like to add? Then you're invited to join the Jewish Speculative Fiction Discussion Group [http://www.sfsite.com/~silverag/jewishsf.html].

Every so often, I come across a site that reminds me about the incredible positive power of the Internet. HebrewBooks.org is one of those sites. Over the decades, rabbis have written commentaries on the Torah, Talmud and other holy works. Many of these commentaries are now out of print, nearly impossible to find and often forgotten. But the people at HebrewBooks.org have tracked down many books (sforim) that are now in the public domain, scanned them and uploaded them to the Internet. There are now 1,280 sforim and 766 journals, all of which can be downloaded for free [http://www.hebrewbooks.org/].

As the site explains, "If you were to ask any rabbi who authored a sefer, what his one wish would be, his answer would surely be, 'I want people to learn my sefer, even after my passing' … When you quote these sforim, please be sure to mention the rabbi's name! In this manner you will bring life to the memory of the author."

Holocaust Education Week

British man saved 669 Jewish children in wartime Prague

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

You never know what can happen when you clean out your house.

One day in the late 1980s, Greta Winston was going through the attic while her husband, Nick, was puttering around in the garden of their home in Maidenhead, England. What she stumbled across stunned her.

She found pictures, documents, and letters about a time in her husband's life he had never mentioned to her. It seems that Nicholas Winton had saved nearly 700 Czech Jewish children from nearly certain death in the Holocaust.

The story was told as part of this year's Holocaust Education Week at an event co-sponsored by the Rash family last week at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

A film about Winton, Nicky's Children, written by former CBC correspondent Joe Schlesinger, was originally shown last May on CBC's Witness series. Schlesinger himself was one of the children saved by Winton.

Winton, then a 30-year-old clerk at the London stock exchange, went to Prague in late 1938. He saw the plight of Jewish refugees, who were living in very difficult conditions and feared what would happen when the Nazis took over the country, as everyone expected.

Children were thought to be in particular danger, and Winton decided to help those who were trying to help them.

The papers in the Wintons' attic showed the steps Winton and his cohorts went through to save the children. He wrote to foreign governments to ask them to allow the children in, even if they didn't have all the necessary papers or qualifications to be accepted as normal immigrants. Only Britain and Sweden agreed to take children.

Some children had family they could go to. Others went to boarding schools. For still others, Winton sent photographs to people he came across, asking them to choose which child they wanted to take in.

In all, Winton helped send 669 children out of Czechoslovakia. Most never saw their families again.

The last trainload was scheduled to leave on Sep. 3, 1939, the day Britain declared war on Germany. None of those children survived.

While some of the children kept in touch with each other, many had no idea who had actually saved them. Winton himself came home to England and simply never talked about what he had accomplished.

When his wife found the papers, she started to contact some of the children, who had grown into adults with families of their own.

In an emotional part of the film, the host of the BBC television program That's Life talked about Winton's actions. She then asked who in the show's audience had been saved by him. A tearful Winton looked around stunned as the entire audience stood up.

Since World War II, Winton has also worked for the elderly, refugees, people with disabilities and for various United Nations causes.

In December 2002, Winton was knighted by the Queen for his humanitarian achievements.

Not all the children were sent to Jewish homes – Schlesinger was sent to a boarding school for Czech refugees. And, Schlesinger said, at one point, some rabbis came to Winton and, unaware of the fate awaiting the Jews, told him they would rather the children stayed in Czechoslovakia than go to Christian homes. Winton ignored their plea, feeling it was more important to save their lives.

Schlesinger added that he didn't know how many of the children stayed Jewish, although he noted that "one is a [Christian] missionary."

Otherwise, he said, they were all "kids who played, went to school, stole apples from the farmer down the road, and kissed girls."

And they also grew up to be productive members of society: Schlesinger became an award-winning journalist; another became mayor of Ealing and is now a member of the House of Lords; and still another became a fighter pilot in Israel's War of Independence.

Still, Schlesinger said, "We were all left with a guilt complex. What did I do to deserve to live when so many died?"

Winton was not the only member of the family to maintain the stereotypical British reserve about his exploits.

Greta, who died in 1999, never told him that she was in the Danish resistance and that at one point she had been arrested by the Gestapo.

Post-traumatic stress a ‘normal human reaction’

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Since the 1970s, there has been a sea change in the understanding of post-traumatic stress disorder among Holocaust survivors, says the founding executive director of the Canadian Centre for Victims of Torture.

“We have come to recognize that the individuals are not pathologically ill. [They are experiencing] a normal human reaction to an abnormal situation. The Holocaust was the illness. For the individual to react to that process was normal,” Joan Simalchik said last Monday at Temple Sinai in a Holocaust Education Week lecture co-sponsored by the temple and UJA Federation Women’s Campaign & Advocacy.

Survivors with post-traumatic stress disorder experienced events, such as genocide and torture, that are outside the range of normal human experience, Simalchik said.

“[During the Holocaust, they developed] strategies to help get themselves through days that are impossible to describe. They were hyper-vigilant and absolutely aware of their environment to the utmost degree. They could not go into a deep sleep, and they had to be suspicious of everything.

“They also forced themselves to imagine they were somewhere else. They [tried] to keep some connection with a sane world where basic necessities are met,” she said.

In their new world after the war, they still felt insecure, Simalchik said. “They remained super-aware of their conditions, and their sleep was still disturbed because they were unwilling to relax.”

Despite similarities among them, however, each survivor is unique, she said. “When we talk about survivors, we collapse a world of experience into one term, but each person has his own experience and memory of events.

“Trauma is an event of context. It is different for each individual,” Simalchik said. “Someone who survives massive social trauma is more than a sum of those events. The traumatic event has had an impact, but the individual has more than that one experience.”

The impact of trauma on a person varies according to the amount of social support they receive and whether they have experienced any sort of Holocaust denial, she said.

“Holocaust denial can be subtle. Experiences are diminished when people are told ‘It takes time to get over it’ or that ‘It probably wasn’t that bad.’ These are the kinds of social mores that keep the effects of trauma alive.”

The creation of the State of Israel and the trial of Adolph Eichmann, the Nazi SS functionary who implemented the Nazis’ “Final Solution,” were two events that changed survivors’ experiences for the better, she said.

“When Eichmann was on trial, the voices of survivors were put on television. That had enormous significance. That trial punctured the legacy of silence.”

The pursuit of justice was paramount to survivors of the Holocaust, she said. “Pursuing justice meant [there was an effort to right a wrong], and that is an element that must be addressed, otherwise there are no conditions for people to heal.”

The children of survivors share in many of their parents’ legacies, Simalchik said. “They share the impact of having no grandparents, aunts or uncles, and they suffer the loss of a carefree youth, because they learned [from their parents] that the world is a dangerous place.”

Survivors and their families adapt, however, and traditions do go on, she said.

“Sixty years after the war, Holocaust museums are still being formed and the Canadian government recently passed a bill to create a Holocaust Remembrance Day.

“During the war people had hope that others would listen to their stories. We are working to ensure that they do.”

'Soviet & Kosher' celebrates Russian culture

By SVETLANA BARKAN
Special to The CJN

Last month's symposium on "Soviet & Kosher: A Century of Jewish Culture in Russia" successfully presented a wide variety of subjects on Russian Jewish culture to a broad audience.

A pre-event concert took place Oct. 25 at the University of Toronto's Walter Hall called "Three Generations of Soviet Jewish Song," which included performances of jazz and folk songs, opera excerpts and a haunting performance of Dmitry Shostakovich's opera Anne Frank's Diary.

The two-day symposium opened Oct. 26. The event's organizers, professors Peter Solomon and Anna Shternshis, included interesting and educational presentations that could appeal to both academics and lay individuals.

Vassily Schedrin of Brandeis University presented an unknown play by Solomon Mikhoels called Builder Amid Ruins. Mikhoels was the founder of the Soviet Yiddish Theatre whose mysterious death has usually been attributed to his conflicts with the Soviet authorities. Schedrin personally discovered this unknown play, which tells the story of a giant tower that is built by numerous workers during the day, but diminishes to its original size by night.

Two-day symposium at University of Toronto

The four musicians of the Red Army Klezmer Band – Michael Alpert, Jeffrey Wollock, German Goldenshteyn and Yosif Kagansky – spoke about Jewish Klezmer music in the former Soviet Union between the 1950s and 1990s. They examined the cross-cultural references in Soviet klezmer music and traced popular Soviet klezmer motifs back to their origins. On the evening of Oct. 26, the band presented a delightful medley of klezmer music from shtetls in Ukraine, Belarus, Russia and Moldova in a concert called "Klezmer Behind the Iron Curtain."

In a presentation called "Jewish culture in Interwar Ukraine: Finding from Oral History," Jeffrey Veidlinger of Indiana University also based his presentation on Jewish folk-motifs in Soviet music. Veidlinger and his team travelled through hundreds of Ukrainian shtetls and villages, collecting oral Jewish folklore, such as legends, songs, fairy tales and poems.

Shternshis gave a powerful and moving presentation called "Rabbis' Daughters Wearing Red Ties: Images of Perfect Soviet Jews in Soviet Popular Culture of the 1930s." She analyzed the transition of Soviet Jews from Yiddish culture to Soviet culture, a transition that was marked by the official suppression of Yiddish language, as well as the government's policy of encouraging the younger generation to become a part of the new, modern society. Shternshis spoke of rabbis' daughters who refused to maintain religious practices in their homes and shed off their Jewishness as a part of the old society. While their fathers were imprisoned for their religious practices, the daughters continued to support the regime, she said.

The symposium ended with a screening of the Soviet Jewish film Seekers of Happiness. Prof. Thomas Lahusen also presented the audience with selections from various other films that portrayed Jews in Russia and the former Soviet Union.

Repairing the world one step at a time - Jonathan Koven's legacy

By Cynthia Cooperstone

All around The Toronto Heschel School, environmental awareness is blossoming. Children are bringing lunches in recyclable containers; composting has become a fruitful habit; garbage output has been significantly reduced; and parents are helping to harvest the organic garden and monitor the irrigation system – even during summer vacation. And for two particular students, Noah and Maya Koven (ages 7 and 5), cultivating this respect for and involvement with nature holds special meaning.

"Environmental studies is a significant part of the Heschel curriculum from JK through eighth grade," says Gail Baker, Principal, "and the children love it." With the support of the Jonathan Koven Memorial Fund set up through the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, the school's environmental education program will receive additional resources to increase awareness and hands-on involvement.

Jonathan's wife, Mara, and his two friends, Ivan Simon and Greg Tugg, established the fund following Jonathan's sudden death from cardiac arrhythmia in September 2002 at the age of 39. It is an apt recognition of Jonathan's contributions as a young Jewish leader, a supporter of The Toronto Heschel School and a friend of the environment.

Jonathan had a profound respect for nature, says his wife Mara. "He lived what Heschel talked about, [recognizing that] life is full of awe, and that we can look around us and feel God's presence. He was the kind of guy who would wake the kids up to look at the stars or encourage them to dance in the rain. He even built a tree house in the back yard without using a single nail."

"Jonathan valued life so much because he came into the world with a huge challenge," says Mara. Born with a congenital heart defect, he survived the physical hardships of his early years, and went on to great academic and professional achievement. He turned passion into activism at Aim Trimark when he spearheaded the first personalized mutual fund report that made generalized, paper-heavy reports obsolete and yielded tremendous cost and natural resource savings.

Even before they had school-aged children, the Kovens decided that Heschel's philosophy jibed with their own, and they became staunch supporters of the school where Noah is now in Grade 2 and Maya attends Senior Kindergarten.

"We wanted to set up something in his memory that would persist long-term," says Ivan who met Jonathan at the University of Waterloo. "We decided that The Toronto Heschel School would be an appropriate place to nurture this permanent reminder of him."

Although the Fund is still in its accumulation phase, Greg Tugg is confident that "people will contribute to help perpetuate Jonathan's memory and beliefs and allow the students the ability to work on something for the benefit of the environment." As the funds are released to buoy environmental initiatives at Heschel, all of the students will remember Noah and Maya's father and share in this ongoing commitment to community, school and environment.

"This is tikun olam in a very literal sense – caring for the world," says Mara, "and these kids are going to inherit this world." In part, because of Jonathan's gifts, they may inherit his sense of responsibility and awe as well.

Tips for snowbirds flying south

Tip #1

You should ensure that you have a Power of Attorney for Personal Care that will be recognized as valid outside of Ontario. This way if medical decisions need to be made on your behalf while you are outside Ontario your chosen substitute decision maker will be recognized. Alternatively, you may wish to consider signing a locally recognized power of attorney for personal care (also called a health care directive or a living will).

Tip #2

Make sure your Will is up-to-date. If you own a residence in the U.S. you may want to consider having a separate Will that deals only with how this residence will be disposed of on your death.

Tip #3

Ensure you have taken steps to avoid subjecting your estate to U.S. estate taxes. U.S. estate taxes are payable by Canadian citizens who die owning assets situated in the U.S. The most common assets for snowbirds to have in the U.S. are their residence, furniture, cars (left in the U.S.), paintings, stock in U.S. companies, debt of U.S. companies and money on deposit with U.S. banks. There are ways U.S. assets can be held which will avoid or defer U.S. estate taxes.

Tip #4

You should consider having your mail re-directed by Canada Post. Alternatively, you should make arrangements for mail to be forwarded to you by a family member or friend. Should you not require your telephone number to be operational in your absence, you should consider deactivating your telephone number. You should cancel all newspaper deliveries.

Tip #5

Last but certainly not least, enjoy your time down south!

Q I am a seventy-eight year old widow. I am concerned that should I become unable to care for myself, the Power of Attorney that my late husband and I each prepared designating our daughter, might no longer cover all of my needs. In particular, I am wondering whether I need to update my Power of Attorney so that my Attorney can continue to provide gifts to my family and various charities I benefit regularly.

A As your lawyer likely explained to you, a Power of Attorney for property is an authority given by one person (the grantor) to another person (the Attorney) to act on behalf of the grantor in conducting her financial affairs. A Power of Attorney provides a mechanism for an individual to maintain some element of control over the administration of her affairs, should she become incapacitated.

Basic Powers of Attorney permit dealing with the grantor's investments, paying the grantor's bills, and buying goods and services for the grantor. The Attorney is required to make expenditures from the grantor's property as are reasonably necessary for the grantor's own support, education and care. If there are sufficient funds, the Attorney may spend the grantor's funds for the benefit of the grantor's dependants. Since your family might not technically be considered dependants, you may want to include a clause in your Power of Attorney which provides that your Attorney is authorized to make cash gifts to them on the occasion of, for example, life events. Special provisions may also be included to ensure your Attorney can continue to engage in effective tax planning on your behalf.

An Attorney may make charitable gifts if specifically authorized in the Power of Attorney or if there is evidence of similar donations having been made by the grantor while capable However, such gifts are limited to twenty percent of the grantor's income or the maximum set out in the Power of Attorney, whichever is less. Such charitable gift amounts can only be exceeded by obtaining a court order. In your situation, you are best to specify the particular gifts you would like to be continued by your Attorney.

Aussie Jewish community leads opposition to Ashrawi award

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Last week, the Sydney Peace Foundation and Centre for Peace and Conflict Studies (under the auspices of the University of Sydney) presented its annual Peace Prize to Dr. Hanan Ashrawi, a prominent spokesperson for the Palestinian Authority.

But not without strong opposition from Australia's Jewish community.

The Sydney Peace Prize is the only international peace prize awarded in Australia. One of its sponsors, the City of Sydney, boycotted the ceremony, with the Lord Mayor arguing that Ashrawi is not a suitable recipient.

Previous recipients of this award include the former UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, Mary Robinson, South African Archbishop Desmond Tutu, and East Timorese leader Xanana Gusmao.

Ashrawi is a senior member of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) who has served as an official spokesperson for PLO leader Yasser Arafat for many years. She has been a member of the Palestinian Legislative Council since 1995, and has served as a cabinet minister under Arafat.

"We're not opposed to the award because we are in any way opposed to Palestinians or to people meeting with, or speaking to Hanan Ashrawi. We're opposed to this award because we are in favour of peace," said Jeremy Jones, President of The Executive Council of Australian Jewry – the equivalent of Canadian Jewish Congress – in an interview from Sydney. "And we simply do not believe that she has, or is currently, furthering the cause of peace."

Much of the controversy has fallen on the shoulders of New South Wales Premier Bob Carr, who agreed to present this year's award before Ashrawi was named this year's recipient.

"I'm not going to withdraw from this for the very simple reason that the security of Israel will only be achieved by a peace settlement with the Palestinians, and we've got to seize every opportunity to engage with both sides, and urge peace on both sides," he said during a broadcast on Australia's Radio National.

Dr. Colin Rubenstein, Executive Director of The Australia/Israel and Jewish Affairs Council disagreed with Carr's decision.

"The idea that she's [Ashrawi] been a force for moderation or reconciliation is frankly laughable," observed Rubenstein during the same radio show.

Ashrawi used the Jewish opposition to her award to deflect attention away from herself and turned it into an issue of Jews versus all Palestinians.

Dr. Hanan Ashrawi

"I knew that for some time now there's been a mobilization to try and prevent any Palestinian voice from being heard," she said in a radio interview from her home in Ramallah, "to try to silence even those who have been struggling for peace all their life despite the severity of the conflict and the fact that we have become few and far between."

"Those who argue in favour of Ashrawi are not doing it to prove her case, but rather as just another opportunity to take cheap shots at the Jewish community," added Jones. "Her speech will be recorded, and I'm sure she'll say only moderate things so that her people can point to it and say she only wants peace. Truth is, she got the award, she came and went, and we'll deal with the consequences later."

Little rest for Holocaust Education Week volunteers

The world's largest Holocaust education program – Toronto's Holocaust Education Week (HEW) – recently wrapped up its 23rd year with more than 120 successful educational and cultural events having taken place across the Greater Toronto area and surrounding cities.

The 13-day event, coordinated by UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto, is recognized around the world as the preeminent program of its kind.

And the success of HEW doesn't come without a tremendous amount of sacrifice on the part of its volunteers.

The Chair of The Holocaust Centre is Howard Driman, who also acts as a consultant to this year's HEW Co-Chairs, Honey Carr and Joan Shapero.

"I went to the Washington Holocaust Museum in 1993 and I had an epiphany of sorts," says Driman. "I came back to Toronto knowing that I simply had to do something, had to get involved. I called The Holocaust Centre and told them that I wanted to volunteer."

One year later, Driman found himself on the HEW committee and he was hooked.

"Originally, we had about 60 programs each year. Today it's double that number," he says proudly. "It took a lot of phone calls and meetings, but it was well worth it when you see not only the number of programs we have today, but the quality as well."

Despite the countless hours, unavoidable headaches, and exhausting schedules they endure as Co-Chairs, both Carr and Shapero would gladly do it again.

"I don't know how I do it actually between my regular job and my three grandchildren, but I always get a second wind and become reenergized when I'm at one of our fabulous programs," says Carr, a child of Holocaust survivors who became a docent at The Holocaust Centre following her experiences on the 1997 March of the Living.

"To me, there is simply no time to rest when we absolutely must educate our young people today. The world is changing and is no longer a secure place to be Jews. As we continue to lose more and more Holocaust survivors, we must use these innovative programs to teach the lessons of the Holocaust for our children and their children," adds Carr.

For Shapero, her father's decision to leave his comfortable posting at Camp Borden during the Second World War in order to fight Nazis was more than enough motivation to get involved.

"My dad, Arthur Zaldin, was a captain at Camp Borden but, as a Jew, he felt it was far more important for him to go and fight the Nazis. In fact, he actually had himself demoted so that he could do this."

Shapero says that despite the rather taxing schedule of Holocaust Education Week, the time spent on such an important endeavour is crucial to its success.

"It's really like a full-time job," says Shapero. "But, while it takes up a tremendous amount of time and energy, it's essential that Honey and I – as Chairs – ensure that we're at as many programs as possible to provide a personal connection."

"Somebody once told me that although I had no relatives in the Holocaust, I, like all Jews, still had a personal stake in the Holocaust," says Driman. "I'm perhaps most proud of the fact that this year we had 35 churches involved in HEW. That is critical because the lessons of the Holocaust are universal, there for all mankind to learn from."

Hillel students present "More Humus, Less Hamas"

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

An innovative new Israel advocacy initiative has given Toronto's university students food for thought.

At York, Ryerson and the University of Toronto, Hillel students recently came together in support of Israel in a campaign against terrorism by plastering their campuses, bags, and bodies with buttons, bumper stickers and posters with the statement, "More Humus, Less Hamas."

The two-week campaign culminated on Thursday, October 30th on all three campuses with "More Humus, Less Hamas" day. Over 1,500 postcards were signed by students, which are to be included on a petition that will be presented to the United Nations demanding that the UN declare suicide bombings and acts of terror against civilians crimes against humanity.

Over 1,500 students at Toronto university campuses signed petitions to be presented to the United Nations calling for suicide bombings to be declared "crimes against humanity." The petitions were signed on "More Humus, Less Hamas" day.

"The response was overwhelmingly positive," says Tilly Shames, Director of Israel Affairs, Hillel of Greater Toronto, a UJA Federation partner organization. "People of all ethnic and religious backgrounds realized that this campaign is more than free humus and pita, that there is a far deeper meaning to the day. Overall, it expresses the students' frustration with the onslaught of terrorist attacks against innocent Israeli civilians and their solidarity with Israelis."

The students handed out free pita and humus at multiple locations, together with information on Hamas, the Palestinian terrorist organization. At the end of the day, Hillel arranged to provide Muslim student associations at the respective campuses with pita and humus as well, to break the Ramadan fast.

"We also had a great response from former Israelis living in Toronto who said they had never seen such a thing," says Moshik Galanty, Hillel's Israel Arts and Culture Coordinator. "They said kol hakavod to have the guts to do this and they are so proud that Hillel is making the campus a better and more comfortable place for them to be."

Naomi Gryfe, a York University student who coordinated the food for all campuses, says "the breaking of bread, which is often symbolic of peace and camaraderie, served to encourage the long awaited beginning of a peaceful atmosphere on campus and a united front against terror."

"We want the students to leave our table with the message that no matter where we live, we will not tolerate the ongoing terror inflicted upon Israel and the world's acceptance of terror through its apathy and silence," says Shames. "Through this campaign, the students are actively declaring that they will not remain silent on this issue any longer and they call upon their fellow students to join them in their petition against the UN."

To build on the momentum of this campaign, Hillel students will continue to have postcards signed on campus and will later visit the Canadian and Israeli delegations at the United Nations in New York to present them with their petition.

Hillel has been instrumental in educating Jewish students about how to deal with anti-Israel intimidation on campus. Student training of this kind is a key platform of UJA Federation

Torontonian helps Israel brush up on its PR

Toronto's Mark Waldman (right) with Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom.

Toronto's Mark Waldman was among experts from North America invited to a recent three-day seminar organized by Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs to coordinate public relations efforts with heads of privately funded Israel advocacy groups.

"Taking into consideration that the public relations budget is continuously on the decline, the fact that groups have sprouted up to help Israel advocacy and provide services worth a great deal of money, is something very welcomed by the Israeli government," says Gideon Meir, the ministry's Deputy Director-General for Public Affairs.

Waldman represented the Canadian Jewish community and CIJA, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy. He was joined by Jennifer Laszlo Mizrahi from the Israel Project and Larry Weinberg from Israel 21C(www.Israel21c.org). It was a gathering that brought together the ministry's closest partners in the field of Israel advocacy.

The 11 participants attending the seminar met with some of the Foreign Ministry's top representatives, including Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and Director-General Yoav Biran. Participants also met with other key officials, including Major General Giora Eiland, Head of Strategic Planning for the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), Brigadier General Ruth Yaron, head of the IDF Spokesperson unit, Nezah Mashiah, head of the Fence Project, Ministry of Defence, and Ra'anan Gissin, spokesperson for the Prime Minister.

"I gave the group a presentation on the new Canadian model of advocacy," says Waldman. "They were very impressed by our organized Jewish community commitment to hasbara (public relations) and the corresponding financial allocations. We talked about ways of cooperating in the future by sharing resources amongst the groups and with the Foreign Affairs Ministry."

Mizrahi briefed the participants on how to communicate more effectively with the American media from her recently released Guide to Proven Pro-Israel Communications which is based on extensive polling and focus groups data in the US.

"It was incredible to see so many government spokespeople sitting around one table with such a strong desire to improve their communications messaging with the American media," says Waldman.

"The government of Israel appreciates the new importance that the North American Jewish community has placed on Israel advocacy given shrinking budgets," says Amir Gissin, Director of the Public Affairs Department, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and the man charged with organizing this meeting. "This is just the beginning of an ongoing process of cooperation between the Israeli government and the North American Jewish community."

San Diego Federation comes to the aid of fire victims

The San Diego Jewish Federation and its Jewish Community Foundation have responded quickly in the wake of that community's worst natural disaster in its history by establishing a Jewish Community Disaster Fund.

Administered by San Diego's Jewish Family and Child Service, the fund will provide immediate assistance to Jewish families and other community members who have been affected by recent fires that raged through the area.

"Federation convened a meeting immediately after the fires began," says UJA Federation of San Diego Campaign Director Barbara Sherman. "There was a complete mobilization of leaders representing every aspect of our Jewish community. It was decided then and there that this was a human problem, not only a Jewish problem. Our community came together and has responded to this tragedy wonderfully. The money will be administered by Jewish Family and Child Service according to need."

The hardest hit area was a neighbourhood called Scripps Ranch in northeastern San Diego, which suffered the loss of almost 300 homes, roughly 10% of which belonged to Jewish families.

In addition, the 20 classroom trailers of the Chabad Hebrew Academy of San Diego were totally destroyed by the fire. An adjacent $25 million building, which is not yet ready for occupancy, was spared, according to Rabbi Yisroel Goldstein. The challenge will be to find temporary classroom space for some 350 youngsters until the new building is ready to be occupied in January.

"We are undergoing the worst disaster in the community's history," says Michael Hirsh, Director Planning and Allocations, UJA Federation of San Diego. "Whereas wildfires in previous years have been confined to rural or fringe suburban areas, the current fires have come right into heavily populated urban areas. We are currently trying to compile lists of other Jewish families who have been affected. A reasonable estimate is that 60 to 100 Jewish families have lost their homes."

San Diego resident Kevin Hsu took this photo of the Cedar Fire that destroyed the Scripps Ranch neighbourhood in northeastern San Diego.

In total, over 1,200 homes have been lost in San Diego County (including those in Scripps Ranch). More than 10% of the surface area of the county has been burned. The fires came within a quarter mile of the Federation building and within a few feet of several synagogues, but fortunately no communal building other than the day school was affected.

"The Jewish community mobilized early on," says Hirsh. "Jewish Family and Child Service and synagogues are providing help to families who need immediate assistance. It is our prediction that there will also be significant needs over the next several months. We are also helping to form a team of attorneys who will assist families in dealing with insurance and other rebuilding issues."

Donations to help families affected by the fire can be made by calling UJA Federation of Greater Toronto at 416.631.5705 and specifying the San Diego Fire Relief Fund as the donation recipient.

Mother, daughter explore their rich Indian heritage

By ABIGAIL TATOR
Special to The CJN

Curry and rice may not at first seem like Shabbat dinner fare, but for thousands of Jews from India, the mix of Indian traditions with Jewish culture is a way of life.

Toronto resident Sabrina Kerbel's parents both grew up in India and moved to Canada a year before Kerbel was born. While she has visited India, Kerbel grew up in Toronto learning of her rich heritage.

India has had a Jewish population for 2,000 years. Its community, centred in Bombay, Cochin and Calcutta, is made up of three distinct groups: the Bene Israel, the Cochin Jews and Baghdadi, Iraqi, Persian and Yemenite Jews. While Kerbel's father's family was from India, her mother's family came from South Africa, Yemen, India and Baghdad.

India's Jewish population reached its peak of 29,000 just before World War II. After Israel's establishment in 1948, most of the population moved there, with about 23,000 people making aliyah between 1948 and 1970.

Today, there are about 5,000 Jews left in India, which has a population of more than one billion. Only two Jewish schools remain and they have had to open their doors to children of other religions due to low enrolment. There are three Jews in the formerly thriving Jewish community of Cochin. Its synagogue has become a museum.

Besides moving to Israel, many of India's Jews settled in England, the United States, Australia and Canada, where the majority live in Toronto and Montreal.

After they left in the 1960s and '70s, they faced discrimination for the first time, Kerbel said.

"They never experienced discrimination in India. The Hindu religion is mostly very tolerant. The Jewish quarter in Bombay was right next to the Muslim quarter and they got along and spent time together," she said.

"They only experienced discrimination when they left India and it was from other Jews. To go out into the world and not be accepted by other Jewish people, having never experienced discrimination, to experience it at the hands of Jews, was disturbing for a lot of people."

Kerbel said these attitudes have improved in recent years.

"You can still get a lot of 'Are you sure you're Jewish? You can't really be Jewish.' But people are much more informed now that there are Jews around the world."

In 1979, Kerbel's mother was one of the founders of Toronto's Congregation BINA, which in Hebrew means reason or understanding. The congregation, which started with five families, now has 120 families.

After holding many posts within the congregation, Kerbel is now president.

"It started with a few families with the same background who wanted to get together to teach their kids and promote their own culture," said Kerbel. "At other synagogues and day schools, children felt different and didn't want to be a part of their Indian heritage. Parents wanted to promote a feeling of well-being and worth to their children."

As one of three Indian Jews at her Hebrew day school, Kerbel said she felt different and wanted to distance herself from her Indian background.

"But [Congregation BINA] worked," she said. "I am very comfortable and I am proud of my heritage."

The synagogue holds High Holy Day services using Sephardi prayer books and traditional Bene Israel melodies. While it does not hold weekly Shabbat services, it celebrates Purim and Chanukah and other social events.

Kerbel said a dedicated building is not possible given the small number of members. The congregation rents the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada building for its services and events.

She described her congregation's style of prayer as similar to that of Sephardi Jews, but with its own melodies and styles. There are no rabbis in Indian congregations.

"In India, we have lay leaders," she said. "The only rabbi they have is at the only Reform synagogue in India."

When Kerbel married her husband Mark, an Ashkenazi Jew, they integrated Ashkenazi and Bene Israel customs into the service. Kerbel had a traditional henna ceremony and the synagogue caterer learned Indian recipes for a meal that was a mixture of Indian and non-Indian food.

As is done in Indian tradition, the congregation sang the Yigdal prayer as Mark walked down the aisle.

Mark was hesitant when Kerbel told him that the tradition was for the groom to sing a love poem, Navah Mikol, as the bride walks down the aisle. But he surprised Kerbel and sang as she approached the chuppah.

Kerbel and Mark plan to teach both Indian and Ashkenazi traditions to their five-year-old son Mitchell, adopted from Russia.

"It is important for children to get to know their roots so they want to pass it on, to say you can be different and still hold your head high and not worry about what people are going to say," Kerbel said.

Kerbel and her mother, Anne Samson, will talk about their culture and traditions, as well as their experiences as Indian Jews on Wednesday, Nov. 19, 8 p.m., in the Jacob Ulrich Hall of Adath Israel Congregation, 37 Southbourne Ave. Admission is $7.

Greater Toronto Area

Memorial service to honour former Toronto rabbi

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Yiddishist Rabbi Gershon Winer, who was raised in Toronto and worked at the Jewish Teachers Seminary in New York City prior to making aliyah in 1970, died in Jerusalem on Yom Kippur. He was 81.

Rabbi Winer, who was a frequent guest lecturer at Beth Tzedec Congregation and for years conducted High Holy Day services at Beth Sholom Synagogue, was born in Widze, Poland in 1922. He was eight years old when his family came to Canada and settled in Toronto.

He attended Harbord Collegiate and received a Jewish education at several local Hebrew schools and yeshivot, including the Brunswick Talmud Torah (later the Associated Hebrew Schools).

He went on to study at Yeshiva College and Columbia University in New York City, and was ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary in 1948. He also earned a PhD from Michigan State University.

He met his wife Nechama Levin at Camp Massad in the Poconos and they were married in 1946.

He served as a congregational rabbi in the United States for 14 years, and was dean and professor of Yiddish literature at the Jewish Teachers Seminary in New York for 10 years.

In 1973, he served as Beth Tzedec's interim rabbi for two months and conducted High Holy Day services there, and for nine consecutive years starting in 1974, he returned for one weekend a year to lecture at Beth Tzedec in English, Hebrew and Yiddish.

For many years, he also returned to Toronto to lead one of Beth Sholom's High Holy Day services.

In Israel, he served as city manager for the town of Dimona and as secretary to the Academy of Hebrew Language. He also founded the Yiddish chair at Bar-Ilan University, where he was a longtime professor of Yiddish language and literature, and he organized the Institute for Yiddish and Yiddishkeit for Jewish students in Russia.

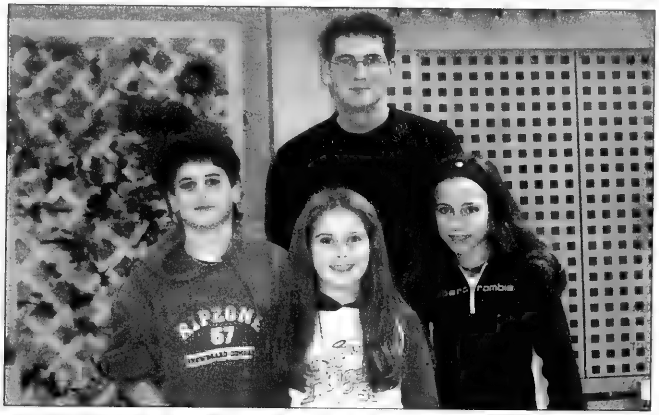
Rabbi Winer wrote a book on Zionism, as well as many articles, and he was a sought-after lecturer.

In her eulogy, his daughter Eudice said her father had three main loves: a love of Eretz Yisrael and the Hebrew language; a love of Jewish tradition; and a love of Yiddish and its culture.

Rabbi Benjamin Friedberg, rabbi emeritus of Beth Tzedec and a colleague and friend of Rabbi Winer, told The CJN, "He was a teacher par excellence in every thing he did, and he was one of the most creative people in organizing Jewish life."

Rabbi Winer is survived by his wife Nechama and three daughters, Eudice and Avi, who live in Israel, and Tirza, who lives in Florida.

A memorial service for Rabbi Winer will be held at Beth Tzedec on Nov. 19 at 7:30 p.m.



BOOK WEEK CELEBRATION: Grade 6 students from Leo Baeck Day School's Holy Blossom and Atkinson campuses recently enjoyed a talk by Kenneth Oppel, author of the books Silverwing, Sunwing and Firewing, as part of their school's celebration of Canadian Children's Book Week. Weinberg helped everyone achieve their maximum

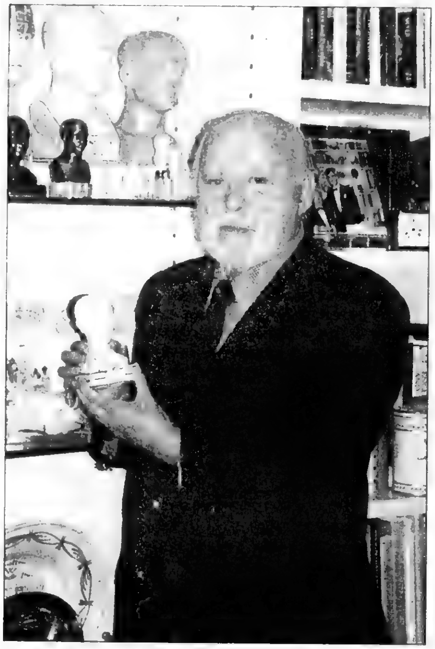
By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Dr. Fred Weinberg, a man who combined his commitment to medicine and Jewish heritage with his passion for family, died last week from cancer at his home in Toronto. He was 84.

The son of Polish immigrants, Rose and Yisroel, who was a founder of the Ostrovitzer Shul at Cecil Street and Spadina Avenue, Weinberg went on to become the first Jewish chief resident at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto.

In 1976, Weinberg became the associate medical director of the child development clinic in the division of neurology at the Hospital for Sick Children, specializing in matters related to attention deficit disorder.



Dr. Fred Weinberg

In his eulogy, Rabbi Benjamin Friedberg spoke of Weinberg's career as a pediatrician, as well as his love of children, medicine, heritage and Yiddish. His many publications included articles in the Canadian Journal of Diagnosis, as well as contributions in Yiddish and English to the Canadian Jewish News.

"While he knew a folk Yiddish from home, he took a month to study literary Yiddish at Oxford," Rabbi Friedberg said.

Weinberg's dedication to heritage was also evident in his commitment to his Judaica collection.

He was a major contributor to the Royal Ontario Museum's Judaica gallery and a founder, adviser and contributor of the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum. His collections were diverse, and besides Judaica, included children's artifacts, medical instruments and early Canadiana.

Many people spoke of his love of teaching.

"He knew that people had different levels of understanding and managed to find a common language to impart knowledge," Rabbi Friedberg said.

Dorion Liebgott, the curator of the museum at Beth Tzedec, said Weinberg's voice used to soften when he began to teach.

"He was the most knowledgable person in Toronto about Judaica. You knew that he took the time to educate himself before he spoke on any subject," Liebgott said.

She remembers him being a very generous man, "always the first to put his hand in his pocket when it came to contributing to the museum.

"He was a man that was never satisfied with the status quo and always pushed himself and everyone else to achieve their maximum," Liebgott said.

Most of all, everyone remembers his passion for family. His oldest son, Joel Weinberg, remembered when he was five years old and ready to run away from home.

"It was a pretty cold winter night and I headed out into the driveway with bag in hand when, at the same time, my father pulled in from work.

"He asked where I was going and I explained. Then he calmly suggested it was OK for me to leave, but that tonight was cold and that I should come back into the house and wait till a warmer day."

Weinberg is survived by his wife, Joy Cherry, their children, Joel and his wife Orly Katsav, Barry and his wife Dorra Ennis, Sari and her husband David Binder, Deena and her husband Sandy Sussman, as well as by grandchildren Jacob, Raquel and Justin Binder, and Adam and Yale Sussman, and by his sisters Helen Friedman and Phyllis Pollack and his brother Maurice Weinberg.

New Israeli studies program at U of Calgary

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — With the establishment of its Kahanoff Chair in Israel Studies, the University of Calgary joins an elite group of only four universities outside of Israel to host a distinguished scholar dedicated to such research and teaching.

Close to 200 Calgarians gathered Oct. 20 to officially welcome the first chair holder, Alan Dowty, who will be in Calgary part-time for the next three years, and to inaugurate the university's new Israel studies program.

Dowty is a distinguished U.S. scholar who spent many years in Israel. A professor in the department of government and international studies at the University of Notre Dame since 1978, he also taught at Hebrew University from 1964 to 1975 and has written extensively on Israel, Arab-Israeli issues, Mideast politics and international relations.

U of C president Harvey Weingarten, said the chair and the new program fit well with the university's commitment to applying the "highest level of scholarship to the analysis and solutions of the significant societal problems facing the world today."

He said he expects the program's interdisciplinary focus to unite scholars from diverse subject areas to "work collectively to raise the level of understanding of Israel in today's world."

Calgary may seem an unusual location for a chair and program in Israel studies, but their founding can be credited to the Kahanoff Foundation, established 25 years ago by Calgary oilman Syd Kahanoff to fund projects in Canada and Israel.

The establishment of the Kahanoff Chair bridges the two foci of Kahanoff's philanthropy, said Jim Hume, the foundation's president. He said the chair and program "will enhance understanding in Canada of Israel" and "shed light on what lies behind the headlines."

The program's director is Shlomit Keren. A former head of the Israeli Defence Ministry's department of historical research and documentation, and of its military museums unit, the graduate of Hebrew U and the University of Minnesota specializes in Israeli defence history and policy.

In his inaugural lecture titled "Israel Studies: Challenge and Vision," Dowty said the lack of attention given to the study of Israel by scholars worldwide "is not consonant to the importance of the subject or to the interest shown it."

Israel is "omnipresent in the media," he noted. Its history is one of the most amazing epics in modern history and it represents a living laboratory of social experimentation with institutions such as the kibbutz.

Its experience in mass immigration, the integration of diverse cultures and the clash of religion and state are all issues that make Israel a worthy subject for academic study, he said.

The weakness of Israel studies outside the country, Dowty said, is counterbalanced by the strength within Israeli academia, where "there is more self-contemplation per square centimetre than in any other literate society."

One of four such programs outside Israel

But almost all of that writing is in Hebrew and doesn't necessarily travel well, he said, and there is a need for outside perspectives.

As well, Israel studies has been "twice orphaned" in academic life, as it is not really welcomed in either of its two natural homes – Middle Eastern studies and Jewish studies.

Although both areas have grown dramatically over the last decades, the study of modern Israel has not been included, he said, because "Israel is too political, too contemporary and too controversial."

Israel studies is now emerging as a distinct field, and U of C will help to develop a new generation of scholars, he said.

U of C will be the next home of the scholarly journal Israel Studies Forum and will likely host the 2006 annual meeting of the Association for Israel Studies, Dowty said.

As well as offering courses for U of C students, Dowty plans educational outreach to the general community, and he said he welcomes Palestinian, Arab and Muslim participation in the program, because "when academics can find common ground, there is more hope" for the future and for peace.

וכך כותב ב. מיכאל בידיעות אחרונות על הצבת גדרות תיל כשלב ראשון לגדר ההפרדה:

"הרבה הפרדה אפשר לעשות ב-3000 קילומטרים של תיל ברזל: בין מקנה לבין מִרְעֵהוּ, בין זית לבין מוסקיו....בין רופא לחולָיו, בין עובד למקום עמלו.....ובעיקר הם יפרידו בין איכר לבין אדמתו. רק הפרדה אחת לא יפרידו כל אלפי הקילומטרים המשוננים הללו: בין המתאבד לבין קורבנותיו..." לדעת ב.מיכאל- יצליחו המתאבדים להסתנן דרך השערים החוקיים תוך שימוש בזהות מושאלת או גנובה.

ואני דווקא מאמין שחובה להקים את הגדר ושהיא , בגדול, כן תעבוד. הינה ניסיון אישי קטן: בגלל הסארס- לא אִפְשרו לאנשים להיכנס לבית החולים שלנו בלי להזדהות. וראה זה פלא- יש ירידה של שמונים אחוז בגניבות! עד כדי כך שהחליטו להשאיר את עניין ההזדהות בכניסה.

אין לי ספק שתוואי הגדר גורם עוול להרבה פלשתינאים. סורִי גְ'יס! אִם ממשלתכם אינה עושה דבר לעצור את המתאבדים, אנחנו חייבים לעשות את מה שאפשר להגן על תושבי ישראל (יהודים וערבים כאחד). אבל שישאר בינינו.

ביקורת ישראלית

אחד הדברים שהכי מצחיקים אותי בָּאָרֶץ זה לקרוא את הארסיות והזבל שמשתמשים בו מבקרים ישראלים כשהם באים לתאר משהו שאינם אוהבים. אז ככה:

בערוץ 1 של הטלוויזיה הפיקו סדרה על סיפור אהבה בין גברת בת שבעים (ליה קניג) לבין איש בן 72 (יהודה ברקן). המבקֵר חנוך דאום, שֶגילו כנראה חצי מגילָם, כותב כך:

" למי שמתקשה להבין מדוע ערוץ ממלכתי מחליט להשקיע את כספי הציבור בסדרת בתי אבות הִנֵה תזכורת:

יוסף בראֵל, האיש שאחראי להשקעה בסידרה, מתקרב מאוד לגיל שבעים...ראש הממשלה, האיש האחראי למינוי המנכ"ל, מתקרב מאוד לגיל שמונים...... ראש האופוזיציה מתקרב מאוד לגיל מאה ועשרים..."

אפילו צודק היה אותו מר דאום והסידרה היא זבל (והיא באמת לא- ראיתי אותה), כמות הזבל לצעירים היא עצומה פי כמה. הוא אומר את זה בלי בושה-"סדרה לבתי אבות".

למה, מה קרה- אנשים זקנים לא משלמים שָם מיסים! ולא מגיע להם לראות סרטים שמגלמים אנשים בני גילם! הזלזול בישראל בזקנים ובזכויותיהם הוא משהו משהו.

הנקמה היחידה באנשים כמו דאום הנ"ל- שזה יקרה גם לו. זה רק עניין של זמן......

News media ignore good news from Israel

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

On Oct. 29, the Reuters news agency reported on an Israeli high-tech company that has developed a processor capable of computing at the speed of light. Using optics instead of silicon, the processor performs an astonishing eight trillion operations per second, which is 1,000 times faster than a standard processor. The breakthrough will allow a whole range of new multimedia and communications applications.

Unfortunately, few people know about this Israeli development, because few media outlets bothered to carry the Reuters story. (The CJN did mention the story last week in its "Week in Israel" column.) It was either crowded out by the familiar political story of the Israel-Palestinian conflict, or it was simply passed over entirely in favour of more "newsworthy" items. Such is what is called "news judgment."

In today's competitive news market, editors admit there is little room for stories from Israel about important developments in science and technology – whether in biotechnology and medical research or computers – even though these are areas Israel excels in, especially given its tiny size and population.

In his Sept. 27 National Post column headlined "These days, no news can ever be good news," Robert Fulford wrote about the tendency of journalists, especially in TV news, to magnify bad news "until it replaces the truth."

It is not, we might surmise, that the bad news is itself untruthful, but rather that a constant diet of the negative distorts the broader newsworthy reality. It's like focusing only on a small – albeit sensational – detail of a great painting and assuming it gives you the whole picture.

"On CNN," wrote Fulford, "we see little [about Israel] except soldiers hunting terrorists, politicians driven to desperation by their Palestinian enemies and paramedics trying to save the victims of bombings. But a visitor to Israel discovers that Israelis do what people do anywhere else – work, study, pray, entertain themselves."

And, it should be added, they produce some of the world's most newsworthy scientific and technological achievements, which benefit people everywhere.

In the Nov. 2 New York Times, Raymond Bonner, reporting from Baghdad, expressed a similar view. Bonner quoted an aide to Paul Bremer, the chief administrator of Iraq, who complained that the media fail to report the progress that has been made in rebuilding Iraqi civil society, focusing instead only on the negative – the attacks on U.S. troops and others. "There is LIFE here," the aide wrote in an e-mail. "The streets are full of life. There are children playing in the streets with other kids… the markets are bustling."

These are important, newsworthy aspects of Iraqi life after the defeat of Saddam Hussein that we rarely see on television news. Their absence parallels the constant diet of the negative news reports from Israel, which has gone on for so long it is little wonder that, in a poll conducted by the European Commission, Europeans ranked Israel at the top of a list of 14 countries, including Iran and North Korea, that they believe pose the biggest threat to world peace

"Particularly in the past three years," Daniel Schwammenthal wrote in the Wall Street Journal Europe on Nov. 5, "the Middle East's only true democracy has been systematically demonized, lowered to pariah state level and made exclusively responsible for the ongoing violence in one-sided reporting."

In his column, which should be required reading for all journalism students, Fulford wrote that "a sense of proportion is precisely what the news can't deliver."

Perhaps. Or is it rather that the news media can deliver it, but won't, whether out of laziness or bias – including even occasional malice – or because of intense commercial imperatives? Certainly this is important food for thought.

Manitoban wanted to 'bring back Hitler's moustache'

"It was exciting to know that somebody was interested," said Baron, who visited her brother's grave in 1977. "It's sad when your loved one is buried so far away."

Baron – née Fenster – was the youngest of five children raised on a farm in Edenbridge, Sask. Her brother Philip, born in 1912, left home to attend high school in Winnipeg, living with a married sister. He later established a plumbing business in Flin Flon, where a children's pool has been dedicated in his memory by the Rotary Club.

As a high school student, he changed his name to Foster so he could join a plumbers' union (and earn a higher wage). Students were not allowed to be in the union, Baron said.

The last time she saw him, Foster had returned to the farm to say good-bye. She made him breakfast before he headed off, and when she went to clean the dishes, she found a $10 bill that he had left for her.

"I was like a millionaire suddenly," she recalls. "We really were very poor."

Sitting in Kadin's living room remembering how she cried when her brother left, Baron's eyes filled again.

When war broke in 1939, Foster joined the RCAF, but he was rejected for combat duty because he was considered too old. Nevertheless, he kept trying to make his way to Europe. "He knew it was bad for the Jews [there]," Baron said.

In August 1940, Foster, who had flown a plane in Flin Flon and trained with the RCAF, paid his own way to London after resigning from the RCAF, and wangled his way into the Britain's Royal Air Force (RAF) volunteer reserve.

"They accepted him, even though he was older, because he didn't have to train [as a pilot]," said Baron.

Foster later entered the RCAF as an RAF member, joining the 404 Squadron (a Manitoba squadron) and flying a Bristol Blenheim that he dubbed the "Flin Flon Floosie."

Despite being shot down once and suffering a broken back, Foster refused an instructor position and returned to flying. "He wrote me [that] he was going to bring me Hitler's moustache," Baron said.

Baron still balances pride in her brother's successful combat missions with the painful knowledge of the toll they took on others. "People are people," she said, "and it hurts me to know that anyone was shot down."

Foster became a squadron leader and was a candidate to become a wing commander when he died, Baron said.

Based in Scotland at the time, he flew reconnaissance missions over the Norwegian coast, looking for German naval boats. The work was dangerous and required expert flying skills, Kadin said.

On Foster's final mission on May 26, 1942, he was flying over water off Egersund with a gunner and a navigator when he managed to shoot down a German bomber before his own plane was shot down.

Sadly, Foster drowned before he could be rescued, said Kadin, who learned about the events from the log of the lone Canadian survivor.

On a previous mission, Foster damaged another German plane. "Rather remarkable," said Kadin, "when you consider his plane was a medium bomber used for reconnaissance duty and not intended for attacking another aircraft."

De Vries Stavland learned from public records in London, England, that Foster returned from leave early, just before his final mission. "This indicates how eager he was for action in the air," she wrote.

"He was a dedicated person, and very much a dedicated Canadian," said Kadin. "He felt he could contribute, and he wanted to go do it."

Last year, Kadin and his wife visited Norway at de Vries Stavland's invitation. At Foster's grave, Kadin buried a rock he had picked up on a visit to Flin Flon three years earlier.

"... a virtuoso performance from a marvellous writer."

Lights, Camera, Chanukah

Shorter days and longer, colder nights. It's enough to make anyone yearn for the brightness and warmth of Chanukah, which starts this year on December 20. And there's nothing warmer or brighter than Chanukah in Israel. Imagine millions of windows with Chanukah candles lighting the way and dozens of holiday activities. Here is just a sampling of what you'll find during your Israeli Chanukah adventure.

THE FESTIGAL FESTIVAL – It's a spectacular Chanukah production, just for children, with performances scheduled for nine Israeli cities. This year's theme Around the World will introduce kids to different countries and cultures. Other festivals will be taking place at the same time, including Haifa's annual Festival of Festivals which marks Chanukah, Christmas and the Muslim period of Ramadan, through poetry and artistic displays by Arab and Jewish artists

EXHIBITIONS – Many museums will be featuring displays of Chanukah symbols. Among them is the U. Nahon Museum of Italian Jewish Art with its historic and ornate chanukiyot (Chanukah candelabra).

BIBLICAL TRIPS – Experience the way our ancestors celebrated Chanukah in the ancient past by visiting the Neot Kedumim Biblical Landscape Reserve between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, near Modi'in. And while you're there, feast on a meal featuring biblical food fare.

HOLIDAY ROOTS – It was in Modi'in where the revolt by the Hasmonean family (popularly known as the Maccabee revolt) against religious repression, which eventually led to the Temple's sanctification, began. Today, there's a popular memorial to our Hasmonean heroes in the Modi'in region. Although it's known as the tomb of the Hasmoneans, there's considerable debate about whether Hasmonean family members were actually buried there, in light of new archaeological discoveries. They were, however, laid to rest somewhere in the area, which makes Modi'in worth visiting. Also consider close-by Beit Guvrin National Park with its ancient caves for visitors to explore.

Dead Sea Scrolls a blockbuster

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The recently ended exhibition featuring three fragments of the Dead Sea Scrolls appears to been a major attendance success.

Pointe-a-Calliere, the Montreal Museum of Archeology, recorded a 52 per cent increase in visitors during the exhibition's run from June 15 to Nov. 2 as compared with the same period in 2002, said the museum's media relations director Claude-Sylvie Lemery.

The number of visits recorded during that period was 222,324, she said, but added the museum does not keep track of where visitors go. In addition to "Archeology and the Bible: From King David to the Dead Sea Scrolls," the museum also had another temporary exhibit titled "The Public Market," as well as its permanent collection.

"But we are convinced that most [of the increased number of visitors] went to the [Dead Sea Scrolls] exhibition. We are very, very happy," she said.

Lemery said many were Montrealers visiting who had never before visited Pointe-a-Calliere, which is in Old Montreal. A large number of out-of-towners also took in the show, which museum officials know because of the comments written in the visitors' book, she said.

The exhibition, titled "Ancient Treasures and the Dead Sea Scrolls," will open at the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Gatineau Dec. 5 and run until April 12.

It includes about 100 artifacts dating from around 1200 B.C.E. to the early years of the Common Era. Many have never been seen outside Israel before, and some are the only known material evidence of biblical personalities and sites. The three scroll fragements are from the first scrolls discovered in 1947. The artifacts are on loan from the Israel Museum in Jerusalem and the Israel Antiquities Authority. A few pieces are also from the National Library and Archives of Canada. The exhibition was organized by the Israel Museum, in collaboration with Pointe-a-Calliere and the Museum of Civilization.

McGill principal says she feels 'very Jewish' after 33 years

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Thirty-three years after her conversion to Judaism, McGill University principal Heather Munroe-Blum says she feels "very Jewish."

Munroe-Blum was the guest speaker at Choices, a major event of the Women's Campaign of Combined Jewish Appeal held recently at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

Addressing the audience of more than 850 from the bimah of the sanctuary, Munroe-Blum, 53, said as a child growing up in Toronto's culturally diverse community, she "had the instinct to embrace Judaism."

Born in Montreal as a Catholic and raised in Hamilton and Toronto as a Unitarian, she married her high school sweetheart Len Blum, a movie screenwriter, at 20, and became Jewish.

The reality of her choice was brought home to her three years later while she was working as a psychiatric social worker at a hospital. Her supervisor, who was Jewish, asked her to take over his caseload when he went on holiday.

"Then out of the blue, he asked, 'Do you feel Jewish?' …Spontaneously, I said, 'Yes, I do.'"

Later, one of her clients, a Jewish man who had insisted that his psychotherapist be Jewish because of the nature of his problems, asked Munroe-Blum four months into their professional relationship, "Are you perhaps a Swedish Jew?"

Munroe-Blum said three people had a major influence on her life because of the choices they made.

The first was her mother, who won a scholarship to McGill but could never fulfil her dream of going to university because her father, an Irish immigrant who worked as a bus conductor in Montreal, didn't think girls needed a higher education.

"She never completely recovered from this choice that had been thrust on her… She stressed to me that it is very important to never let gender or other differences stand in the way of your dreams," said Munroe-Blum, the first female principal of McGill.

Instead, her mother went to "steno school," married and had six children, including Munroe-Blum's five brothers. Her mother, she added, also wanted her to "have the freedom to choose a religion."

Monroe-Blum's second major influence was her physiotherapist, who helped her walk again after a severe bout of polio at age five. The physiotherapist did not subscribe to the conventional view at the time that bed rest was the best treatment, and instead believed in active therapy. Even though Munroe-Blum's mother did not have the means to pay, she took on Munroe-Blum as a patient for a year, after which the girl was able to walk without support.

Monroe-Blum said her third mentor was her Grade 6 teacher at a Toronto public school, Murray Sandler, a Jewish immigrant. "In downtown Toronto [at the time], it was still tough for a Jew to advance in the public school system," she said, adding she admired how he faced this subtle discrimination.

Munroe-Blum, who became McGill's principal and vice-chancellor at the beginning of this year, returned to university to study science after a social work career, earning a PhD and becoming an epidemiologist in psychiatric disorders.

"From my own life experience, I can say it's rare that we don't have a second chance," she said. "Life is a mystery, an ongoing adventure. We have to be open to what is new and unfamiliar. "

Jewish officer ends 27-year police career

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There are an estimated 50, or perhaps as many as 55, Jewish police officers in Ontario, but their number recently went down by one.

Claude Gelbard, a 27-year veteran of Peel Regional Police, has hung up his badge and locked his sidearm away. Gelbard retired from active duty to take a position with X-Copper Legal Services, a company that provides legal counsel for traffic-related infractions. But he has not severed his relationship with other officers of Jewish background.

Claude Gelbard

While working in Peel, Gelbard, 47, played an instrumental role in networking with other officers and compiling the list of Jewish coppers who meet occasionally at informal get-togethers.

The get-togethers were the vision of Canadian Jewish Congress official Bernie Farber and Al Zunder, a police officer, who were childhood friends.

Gelbard plans to continue his association with the Jewish officers, and he will continue to encourage young Jews to consider a career in policing.

Policing, Gelbard says, "is a wonderful career. I've enjoyed my time as a police officer… It's a wonderful way to serve the community. It's not something a Jewish boy or girl should not do because it's not a Jewish occupation."

During his lengthy career, Gelbard served for seven years as a beat patrolman; he worked in the youth bureau dealing with juvenile crime; he attained the rank of captain in the militia for his work with young military cadets; and he held administrative posts in the records and recruiting departments.

There were times when beat work was routine, he says, but he also faced plenty of dangerous situations.

As a young cop fresh out of police school in the late 1970s and early 1980s, Gelbard drove a patrol car. On one occasion, as he and two other officers responded to a call about a disturbance, they were confronted by an agitated fellow yelling and holding a shotgun. "That was a bit of a shock. It took a lot of time, but we talked him down," he recalls.

It turns out the gun was unloaded and the fellow was mentally unhinged. Luckily, he never actually pointed the gun at the officers.

On another occasion, Gelbard was on patrol with a visiting officer from Britain when his trained eye noticed something odd about a car full of teenagers. Gelbard followed the car into a plaza parking lot and pulled up as the first group of five teens was about to square off in a rumble with another group of teens, each armed with metal objects and knives.

Exiting his car, he pulled out his gun and ordered, in a very authoritative voice, the youths to put down their weapons. "And they did," he says today, shaking his head and not quite believing his own good fortune.

Later, he and his British colleague discussed the incident. When he asked his colleague what he would have done in a similar situation in Britain, where police don't carry sidearms, he was told, "I don't know."

Gelbard regards firearms as merely a tool of the trade, and he recounts that in all his time on the Peel force, he never had to shoot anyone, though he did use his gun in about 12 arrests.

Fistfights, on the other hand, were not at all uncommon. For some reason, troublemakers in the lakeshore area of Mississauga back in the 1970s and 1980s enjoyed a good scrap, and they would resist arrest just so they could get into a tussle with an officer, Gelbard recalls.

It was as though they had to get their aggression out of their system, he says, and once the fight was over, he'd often hear them say it was a good fight and now they were ready to be taken in.

Luckily, his training in the martial arts – as a youngster, he trained in boxing and karate at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre – stood him in good stead, and "I could handle myself in a fight."

But, he points out, that was the exception, not the rule, in policing.

Gelbard says his upbringing also influenced the way he dealt with the public – he was always taught to treat other people with respect.

"Over my career, I'd say more than 80 per cent of the people I dealt with treated me nicely. I like to think that reflected how I treated them, like a gentleman or a lady."

Gelbard's time on the street came to an end in 1992 when he was in a terrible traffic accident – the victim of a drunk driver – that put him off work for two years. When he returned after recovering from head, knee and back injuries, he took an administrative position in the records department and then went into recruiting. The perpetrator, meanwhile, spent nine months in jail and was then deported.

Gelbard says he first realized he wanted to be a police officer at a pretty young age. While in Grade 13, he applied to RCMP and OPP cadet school, but was turned down. He enrolled in law enforcement at Humber College and continued to apply to dozens of forces. He was even willing to move to pursue his career, but police forces were not hiring at the time. Finally, he received a positive response from Peel police.

For Gelbard, policing meant the chance to follow his dream.

"I liked the fact people were helped by police officers. I was very involved in the community at the time, and mom and dad taught me to get involved and help the community."

"But I don't think they really accepted it until I came home in a uniform."

Montreal MP promises to help caregivers

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The public saw another side of Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, that of a son caring for his gravely ill mother, when he helped launch Quebec's first annual Caregivers Week at an event at the Jewish Eldercare Centre.

"I would not have the presumption or the pretension to call myself a caregiver, because I have received more from my mother than I have been able to give her," Cotler said, adding that he has been fortunate to have received support that has allowed him to live the way he has, a choice most caregivers don't have.

Fay Cotler is now in the palliative care unit at Mount Sinai Hospital after suffering a stroke 2½ months ago that has severely impaired her speech. Paget's disease, a chronic, progressive condition that she has had for many years, robbed her of her sight and hearing over the last two years.

Cotler said his mother was a caregiver all her life. As a young woman, she cared for her mother, who was left disabled by a stroke. Then, successively, she cared for a brother and a sister who both died of brain tumours. By the time she was in her 60s, she was caring for her husband.

Nathan Cotler spent the last three years of his life at the Jewish General Hospital. "I don't recall a day in those years that my mother did not walk from her home on Carleton Avenue to visit my father," Cotler said.

Cotler believes his mother paid a "physical and psychological price" for the strain of caring for others.

Even in her condition today, Cotler said she still sees herself as a caregiver, rather than a recipient of care. "She strains to speak to us, and the first thing she says is thanks for being there and asks how we are."

Cotler told his story as a way of recognizing caregivers, whom he called "invisible and indispensable to our health-care system. They save the system $5 billion a year. Health care would collapse without them."

Cotler said governments and health-care administrators should seek the input of caregivers on how services are delivered. Caregivers often catch mistakes made by overworked health-care professionals, he said.

He vowed to raise the need for practical help for caregivers in the House of Commons, including reimbursement for out-of-pocket expenses, the possibility of continuing to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan while they're out of the labour market, and compassionate-care benefits. He also said the definition of family should be expanded and that there must be greater recognition of caregivers for the chronically ill, and not only for those ill for a temporary period.

Ethel Roskies also spoke about caring for her husband with Alzheimer's full time for the last four years.

"I used to think that the hardest job was raising a child… but I have discovered child-rearing was a cinch," she said.

Caring for a chronically ill person is a journey on a downward slope, she said.

"No matter how difficult a phase a child goes through, it is transitory. But with a person with Alzheimer's, there is no end in sight, except either their death or yours."

Caregiving is also very lonely, Roskies said. While parents can share experiences with others, those caring for the chronically ill are each in an "atypical" situation.

"You may discuss toilet training of your child with friends, but try talking about the toilet problems of a 70-year-old man and you will see your social circle shrink remarkably."

Roskies said caregivers "need more than kind words." They need continuous emotional support, practical help finding resources and respite that is more than a couple of hours a week.

"We need enough time to allow us to pursue a hobby, a course or even a part-time job in order to maintain our own identity."

Above all, caregivers need financial aid, she said. "We hear over and over again how much we save the system. Why not return some of that to us in the form of tax credits or grants?"

Caregivers Week was organized by Professionals Networking for Caregivers, a coalition of 22 health and social services institutions – including most of those in the Jewish community – and non-profit organizations. It was held under the auspices of CLSC Rene-Cassin.

Co-ordinator Lucy Barylak said she would like to see "thousands" marching in the street next year to draw attention to the plight of caregivers. "We have to put the issue on the map… We need your voices, because your voices are what the government will hear."

Jewish Book Fair opens

The 27th annual Jewish Book Fair, one of the largest of its kind in North America, opened this past week-end with a program that offered a glimpse of our Yiddish past.

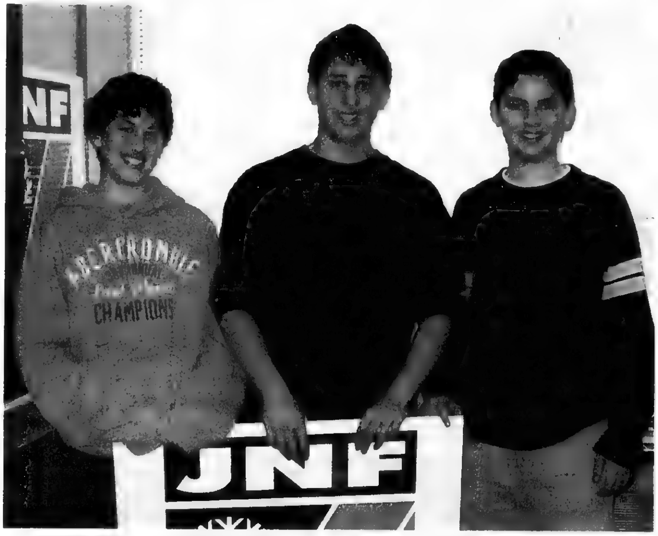
To an almost capacity crowd at the Koffler Centre of the Arts at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, guest celebrities Harvey Atkin, Marilyn Lightstone, Paul Soles, Sarah Swartz, Morley Torgov and Honey Novick read selections from the Sandra Bark anthology Beautiful as the Moon: Radiant as the Stars, Jewish Women in Yiddish Stories.

In introducing the program sponsored by Na'amat Canada, Machi Steinberg, chair of the book fair, said all the participants "agreed enthusiastically to share their talents, and to charm us with Yiddish stories.

"In this topsy-turvy time when innocents become the victims, we look to our roots for pride and sustenance."

The power of the written word is great, she said, and "we all recognize the importance of this cross-community cultural event."

The Jewish Book Fair is a program of the Koffler Centre of the Arts with the co-operation of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.



LEADERSHIP WORKSHOP: Middle school students from USDS were invited by Eithan Glaser, the JNF Jerusalem Emissary to Toronto, to a special leadership workshop. The students learned about involvement recruitment and fund raising strategies. Upon their return the students shared their experiences with their student council rep. and are now getting ready to put their knowledge into action. LOUIE MAREY – Continues to Dream

Louie Marey, aged 20 from the Druze village of Hurfeish was injured when a charge set by terrorists exploded as his jeep passed by. He was driving near Moshav Zarit on the border of Lebanon.

"There were four of us on patrol: driver, paramedic, signaler and me. Once the terrorists blew up our jeep, I knew immediately that my legs were blown off. Even knowing this I worried about the others with me. I feared we would be hi-jacked, therefore it was vital for me to function. I opened my door and fell from the jeep. I fell on my back and my legs fell on me. The paramedic was in shock, so I told him not to worry but just continue shooting.

The rescue team eventually arrived and took me to Rambam Hospital. In the helicopter, I thought about my parents, twin brother and fiancé – wondering if I would ever see them again."

It was later established that the terrorists known as "The Group of Shahid Ramsey Nahara" had been following the movements of the patrols at that point of the border for a long time and knew when and where to activate the charge.

Louie received a citation from the Galilee-division commander and the head of the northern-command headquarters. Louie felt honoured that his contribution to Israel was acknowledged at such a high level.

"When I recover, I plan to join the basketball team of Beit Halochem and continue working on my upper-body muscles using the fitness facilities at the Centre. I will have to give up my big dream of riding a large motorcycle but know that having Beit Halochem, my family and friends I will find other interests and will learn to adapt to my situation."

Israelis back both territorial compromise and Sharon: journalist

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Israelis would give up the territories in a second for a comprehensive peace, but they will also continue to vote for Ariel Sharon and his tough anti-terrorist policies, says one of Israel's foremost journalists.

Yossi Klein Halevi, best-known as a columnist for his work in publications including the Jerusalem Post and The New Republic, said he was among the naive, idealistic Israelis who succumbed to the seductions of Oslo a decade ago.

"During the first intifadah [in the late 1980s], I became convinced that the Israeli left was right, that you had to do anything to end the occupation before the next generation," he told an audience of several hundred recently at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron synagogue.

> 'The concept of a two-state solution has no moral legitimacy to Palestinians'

As subsequent years passed, Halevi wavered. He voted for the late Israeli prim minister Yitzhak Rabin – "I remember weeping with relief" when he was elected. Then he voted for Benjamin Netanyahu, Ehud Barak and Sharon – twice.

Halevi said a hard truth hit him and other Israelis of like mind who were forever hoping Palestinian leaders would one day make a deal and live in peace with Israel: Palestinians would never accept the "two-state" solution.

"The tragic, fatal mistake of Oslo supporters like myself was [thinking] that Palestinians would have the same conceptual breakthrough of recognizing the Jewish national claim [as we had in recognizing theirs]. It was a matter of accepting dual legitimacy versus accepting only Palestine."

To this day, this has not happened, he said. Halevi was told by a Palestinian moderate that "the concept of a two-state solution has no moral legitimacy to Palestinians."

For years, Halevi said, he compromised his journalistic integrity by ignoring the obvious signs. Soon after the Oslo accords were adopted, PLO leader Yasser Arafat told an audience in Arabic about how the Palestinians would gradually reclaim all of "Palestine" in phases.

"I shoved it aside," Halevi admitted. "You can't accuse Arafat of hiding anything from us."

The position Halevi holds today, he said, is held by many Israelis, who were once polarized between Peace Now on the left and the "Greater Israel" types on the right.

There is now an Israeli "centre," a common middle ground, he said. Those on the left have moved right after being "completely shattered" by the realization they were all wrong about Oslo and trusting Arafat. But the same people have not "embraced the settlements," Halevi said.

Those on the right have moved left, saying they would allow a Palestinian state and give up most of the West Bank and Gaza in exchange for a real, comprehensive, two-state solution and peace. But that is not even close to being on the horizon, Halevi said.

"What do we do today? There is no answer," he said. "You can't even ask the question yet. There is no one in the Palestinian leadership ready to uphold the legitimacy of a permanent two-state solution. They see [the solution] only as interim.

"Oslo also created the reverse of what it was supposed to: a generation of Palestinians less capable of making peace with Israel than the previous generation.

"There is a culture of denial in the Muslim world that says the Jews have no legitimate history. Holocaust denial is now mainstream."

Another factor is that a comprehensive peace would entail "redividing Jerusalem."

Halevi, who wears a kippah, said he would even be reluctantly willing to do that, if it brought about true peace, but it is not an issue that has to be addressed as long as a two-state solution is rejected.

Both sides, he told the audience, "have legitimate claims on all this land," which leaves the two-state solution as the only acceptable compromise.

The only approach right now, Halevi said, is to take things day by day, keep up the war against terrorism, continue construction of the security fence and hope for "miracles."

Halevi was a member of a delegation of 350 Arabs and Jews from Israel and France who visited the Auschwitz death camp last May, an initiative undertaken by Father Emile Shoufani, an Arab Christian cleric in Israel, to "break the psychological abyss."

Halevi said it was "one of the most moving experiences of my life."

The Arab participants were also moved, Halevi said, but one told him he had been advised not to participate. "You will lose your victimization if you do this," the Arab was told.

"What we need from the Arab world is a sense of decorousness," Halevi said. "The occupation has reinforced their sense of backwardness."

Halevi spoke as part of a three-part "Initiatives for Peace" lecture series co-sponsored by the Jewish National Fund and the synagogue. Other sponsors are the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research and FEDERATION CJA's Israel and overseas department.

Sharing food with friends

About Food

By NORENE GILLETZ

When I was in New York City recently, I made dinner plans with one of my Internet "panpals," Dalia Carmel. We had "met through the Net" as members of a warm group of foodie-friends called Rinaslist who enjoy sharing recipes and friendship.

Dalia and I had spoken on the phone several times, but had never met in person. She insisted that I come to her apartment to relax after an exhausting day of work. Then we would have dinner at her favourite Turkish restaurant. I asked if I could bring along another foodie-friend.

"Of course!" she replied warmly.

When we walked through the door of her New York apartment, it was like entering cookbook heaven. There were bookshelves of cookbooks lining almost every wall of her apartment – including the entrance hall, living room, dining room, even the bedroom. It was like being in a magnificent library.

Surprisingly, Dalia's kitchen doesn't contain any cookbooks – in fact, there's barely room to make a sandwich! There are three food processors and two blenders snuggled together in one corner. A sturdy pot rack hangs from above, with 20 skillets of all sizes hanging from it. When I asked why she needed so many frypans, she replied "For one egg, two eggs…"

Dalia's cookbook collection is arranged by categories – Italian, Jewish, Middle Eastern, Hungarian, Turkish, Chinese, vegetarian. There are nearly 6,000 cookbooks in her immense collection. Her late husband Herb jokingly said that they must have multiplied at night because every time he looked, there seemed to be more!

Dalia declared, "I am afraid to buy any more. I'm sure the apartment below will suffer from the weight."

Israeli born, she left in 1960. She became curious about cooking while living in England. Although she did not know how to cook, she loved food. When Dalia moved to the United States, she received a mailing addressed to "The Occupant." It was from a cookbook club, offering three cookbooks for a dollar. She chose the three thickest books on the list. Little by little, her collection grew and she was hooked.

Many of Dalia's friends are well-known cookbook authors and she is also an accomplished photographer. Several of her photos grace the covers of cookbooks.

'The angel of American food writers'

When we took a cookbook tour through the various rooms of her apartment, Dalia reached into a shelf and handed me a small book. "This is a gift for you." It was a copy of Ravensbruck 1945, Fantasy Cooking Behind Barbed Wire by Edith Peer, a Holocaust survivor.

Peer had gathered recipes from the women prisoners of Ravensbruck. Then, with the help of close friends, she had the first edition of 500 copies translated and printed. Her plan was to donate the books to a Jewish charitable organization to use as a fundraiser. Her generous offer was refused because the book contained many non-kosher recipes; both Jews and non-Jews in the camp had shared the food fantasies that helped sustain them. One copy went to the Jewish Museum in Sydney, Australia, where it went on display. Peer stored the unsold copies in her apartment.

Meanwhile, Dalia was instrumental in the publishing of another Holocaust cookbook memoir, In Memory's Kitchen, A Legacy from the Women of Terezin, edited by Cara de Sylva. Through de Sylva's Web site, Dalia learned that a similar cookbook was on display at the Jewish Museum in Australia, but the person didn't elaborate. She volunteered to act as a sleuth and track it down.

Dalia discovered that Edith Peer had moved to a smaller apartment, so she had to get rid of the unsold copies. She gave them to a friend, who threw everything away, except for 10 copies. Dalia bought them all. She donated one copy to Yad Vashem, and several others went to specialized Judaica cookbook collections. Apparently, there are quite a few collections at Yad Vashem in various languages.

Ingredients and instructions were vague and incomplete; women of that generation expected the reader to know how to cook. There are recipes for all sorts of delicacies, including Cheese Dumplings, Marrow Dumplings, Stuffed Veal Steak, Chocolate Marquise, Viennese Slice and Special Wedding Cake. There are copies of handwritten recipes in Yugoslavian in the centre of the book.

From the Foreward of Ravensbruck 1945 by Peer: "It was bitterly cold, our spirits and bodies broken. We shivered, not only because of lack of proper clothing, but because of our empty stomachs; we were desperately hungry. There was nothing to warm our emaciated bodies after the infamous 'Appel' (rollcall) twice a day.

"So we started to talk about glorious food, food that was served around the family table during better times. I was able to gather some paper and pencils and asked my fellow inmates to write down their recipes in the hope that, if the unbelievable miracle of freedom ever eventuated, I would be able to feed my feeble body with those gourmet dishes. Many of these recipes were incomplete in that they did not specify the quantity of the ingredients required for that particular dish; nevertheless, they give enough guidance for an experienced cook to be able to prepare them.

"Looking back now, I think that our preoccupation with these recipes reflects the degree to which civilized people had been degraded by an inhuman system and the solace we found in our fantasy dishes."

Claudia Roden refers to Dalia Carmel as "the angel of American food writers, because she makes her gigantic library of cookbooks available to all who ask." This Syrian version of a marvelous red pepper paste in Roden's The Book of Jewish Food comes from Dalia Carmel. Enjoy.

DALIA'S MUHAMMARA
Walnut and Roast Pepper Paste

4 large red bell peppers
1 hot chili pepper
2 slices whole-wheat bread, crusts removed
1½ cups shelled walnuts
1 garlic clove, crushed in a press
3 tbsp. pomegranate concentrate (molasses) juice of 1 lemon
1 tsp. sugar
½ to 1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. cumin (optional)
½ cup extra-virgin olive oil, or more if necessary
3 or 4 sprigs of flat-leafed parsley, finely chopped, to garnish

Roast and peel the peppers. Choose fleshy peppers. Put them on a baking sheet under the broiler, about 3½ inches from the heat (or grill them on the barbecue). Turn them until their skins are black and blistered all over. Put them in a pan with a tight-fitting lid or in a brown paper bag and twist it closed. Leave for 10 to 15 minutes. When cool enough to handle, peel them and remove the stems and seeds.

Put all the ingredients except the parsley in a food processor and blend to a thick creamy paste. Serve sprinkled with the parsley. Serves 8 to 10.

'Palestine Week' held at University of Waterloo

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

WATERLOO, Ont. — Jordan Sheldon, a third-year student at the University of Waterloo, says he felt like "a dagger" had gone through his heart when he entered the university's Student Life Centre and saw the Arab Student Association's Palestine Week display.

"What is my university supporting?" he asked himself as he looked at anti-Israel literature and posters of Israeli soldiers with guns apparently pointed at young Palestinian children.

Sheldon said he feels there should be a fact-checking and approval process before such displays are allowed at an institution of higher learning.

Of particular concern to him is the number of students who have minimal knowledge of Judaism and Israel, "and the first thing they're introduced to is propaganda. They're hearing a very one-sided view that doesn't include all the facts."

He said many UW students are from small-town Ontario and are "less worldly" than their counterparts from big cities.

Sheldon – a member of the Jewish fraternity AEPi, as well as the Jewish Students Association (which serves an estimated 350 students at Waterloo and nearby Wilfrid Laurier University), and a new Israel advocacy group called the Waterloo-Israel Political Affairs Club (WIPAC) – said that "basically, all we can do is show up and tell people the truth."

Although he would like to be more knowledgeable, he said he "tried to offer an overview" to the best of his ability at the Palestine Week event. He also pulled out the necklace that he was wearing inside of his shirt, to ensure that the Chai (the Hebrew word for "life") was visible.

Sheldon said he hasn't seen much anti-Semitism on campus, although controversial anti-Israel professor Norman Finkelstein spoke at Waterloo this past summer, and Matthew Plant, president and founder of WIPAC, attended a similar lecture last year.

Plant's group, which has about 30 active members, is in the midst of an appeal process to be granted club status and is involved in building a national coalition of Zionist campus groups.

Plant said he was disgusted by the Palestine Week display. "They have an interesting portrayal of history. It's quite twisted in their favour. A lot of the information has no basis whatsoever. It's just designed to inflame."

The more objectionable displays at the Student Life Centre had been removed by last Wednesday, said Plant.

"This is just one incident in the bigger picture," said Bill Chernin, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's director of campus services for western Ontario. "What's been going on [at Canadian campuses] is very alarming."

Plant said WIPAC was planning to hand out Canada-Israel Committee information sheets condemning Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat for abuse of international aid at a lecture last Thursday evening by Waterloo professor Fadle Naqib on the economics of the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza.

"We'll be there, prepared to ask questions and confront," Chernin said on Thursday afternoon. He has organized advocacy training for the students this year, because "too often, when there's something like Palestine Week or a speaker, it's a piecemeal effort to counter it… You have to be proactive."

Waterloo is "certainly no Concordia," Chernin said, referring to the Montreal campus where violence by pro-Palestinian students in September 2002 prevented former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu from delivering a planned lecture. "Generally speaking, relations [at Waterloo] are good."

Finkelstein's talk was "sort of an eye-opener," Chernin said. "It was very alarming to the left-wing Jewish students, who found that left-wing groups were not receptive to their concerns."

Such matters are complicated by the preponderance of co-op students at Waterloo, Chernin said. "There are three terms in a year, and we're dealing with different student governments and different student groups every term."

Nasrallah: No prisoner swap without Samir Kuntar

By GIDEON ALON and YOAV STERN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom responded Monday to a Hezbollah demand that a proposed prisoner swap would go forward only if Israel freed jailed terrorist Samir Kuntar.

"Kuntar is not on the list" of over 400 Arab prisoners Israel has agreed to release in exchange for businessman Elhanan Tannenbaum and the bodies of three soldiers held by Hezbollah since 200, Shalom said.

Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah said the prisoner exchange deal, narrowly approved in an Israeli cabinet meeting on Sunday by a margin of 12 to 11, would not be carried out without the release of Kuntar, jailed in Israel since a 1979 attack in Nahariya in which he murdered three members of the same family and an Israeli policeman.

"Hezbollah's conditions have become clear and defined, and we are sticking to them in all circumstances," Nasrallah said in a statement.

But Shalom said Monday that after clear statements by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Israeli chief negotiator Ilan Biran and Shalom himself, "Hezbollah knows explicitly, and we said throughout the recent negotiations, that Kuntar is not on the list. The prime minister took this decision, which in my view is courageous and important, and has stated it in the clearest possible terms."

Hezbollah officials have been quoted as saying they have a letter from Israel stating that Kuntar would be part of a future prisoner release. Asked if past Israeli governments had explicitly or implicitly agreed to free Kuntar as part of a swap, Shalom said, "Hezbollah knew very well what the the present government of Israel's position was in connection with Samir Kuntar. There were no surprises here.

"Regarding Kuntar, who killed an Israeli family, from our standpoint this is a principle. We have not freed Palestinians, or nationals of other countries, with blood on their hands."

Shalom said it is time Hezbollah realized that Israel has bottom-line demands of its own. "Anyone who hears the terms of the deal might well think that we've gone crazy, giving hundreds of Palestinians, as well as dozens of Lebanese, people from Syria, Morocco, Sudan and Libya, all in exchange for Elhanan Tannenbaum and the three abducted soldiers. But this is exactly what distinguishes us from all the others."

Bassam Kuntar, Samir's brother, told Arab media outlet Al-Jazeera that Hezbollah leader Sheikh Nasrallah promised him the deal would not be carried out without his brother's release, Army Radio reported.

"Nasrallah was very clear when he said there would be no exchange without Samir, and Nasrallah never reneges on his promises," Kuntar said, the Al-Jazeera Web site reported.

Hezbollah has yet to release an official reaction to the Israeli cabinet's decision, saying it would wait for an official confirmation by the German team mediating the deal, Lebanese newspapers reported Monday.

Under the terms of the deal, Israel would release some 400 Palestinian and 20 Lebanese prisoners, including Lebanese militants Hezbollah leader Sheik Abdul Karim Obeid and Shi'ite activist Mustafa Dirani, in exchange for the return of Tannenbaum and the bodies of Israel Defense Forces soldiers Adi Avitan, Omar Suwad and Benny Avraham.

Tannenbaum was kidnapped by Hezbollah from an Arab country in October 2000, shortly after the three soldiers were ambushed and abducted on the Israel-Lebanon border. The three have since been declared fallen in action.

The families of the three soldiers expressed satisfaction at the decision, while the attorney for the family of missing Israel Air Force navigator Ron Arad called the vote politically motivated.

The Arad family has been lobbying against the inclusion of Obeid and Dirani in the deal, arguing that they were captured by Israel specifically as bargaining chips for information on the missing navigator. Dirani is believed to have been Arad's captor.

The proposal voted on by the cabinet Sunday included a section in which Sharon appointed a special team to seek information about Arad, who has not been heard from since he bailed out of his plane over Lebanon in 1986.

Israel likely to talk with new Qureia cabinet

By ARNON REGULAR and ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel is likely to open a dialogue with Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia's new government once it is sworn in, despite the fact the cabinet's composition leaves Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat in charge of the PA's security services, government sources in Jerusalem said Sunday.

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said Sunday the new Palestinian government "will be judged by its actions," but added that "leaving security authority in Arafat's hands is not promising."

That Arafat will retain effective control of security became clear earlier this week when he and Qureia agreed to appoint Hakam Balawi, a member of Fatah's Central Committee and one of Arafat's close associates, as the new interior minister.

The Interior Ministry oversees three of the PA's eight security forces: the preventive security service, the police and civil defence.

Balawi's appointment was a clear victory for Arafat. Qureia had been trying for weeks to get his own candidate, General Nasser Yussef, into that slot.

As of last Saturday, Palestinian sources had been predicting that Balawi would only receive responsibility for the ministry's civilian functions. But Sunday's decision gives him authority over its security functions as well, turning him into one of the most powerful men in the PA.

Balawi will also serve as secretary-general of the PA's National Security Council, which is responsible for the remaining five security services. The council is chaired by Arafat. Its other members include Qureia, Finance Minister Salam Fayad and the heads of the various security agencies.

The rest of the 24-member cabinet, which Arafat and Qureia finalized Sunday, was presented by Qureia to the Palestinian Legislative Council for approval Wednesday. Key appointments include Fayad as finance minister, Saeb Erekat as minister in charge of negotiations with Israel and Nabil Qassis as planning minister.

The new cabinet will include eight members who have never served in any government before.

Fighting for kosher slaughter in Britain

By ANDREW MORRIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A campaign to repeal laws that guarantee the right to practise kosher slaughter (shchitah) has prompted a show of unity among Britain's Jews.

Currently all animals slaughtered for food in Britain must be stunned before their throats are cut, except for those killed by kosher and halal (Muslim ritual slaughter) methods.

Both religions forbid stunning, which they believe causes unacceptable suffering to the animal. And both have been the target of a campaign by groups that say religious slaughter is inhumane.

The leaders of the newly formed Shechita UK, which brings together representatives of the groups fighting to keep shchitah and the kosher meat it produces legal, say they intend not just to defend the practice against the stunning recommendations, but to prove that the kosher method of slaughter is as humane as the methods practised in non-religious slaughterhouses, if not more so.

"Together we will not just protect shchitah, but promote it," said Henry Grunwald, president of the Jewish Board of Deputies and honorary chair of the new group.

It is a battle that Shechita UK will have to fight vigorously. In Europe, religious slaughter is often seen by the wider public and by many animal rights groups as cruel and unnecessary.

"There has been a groundswell of interest by the public in animal rights issues, but little is known or understood about the Jewish method of slaughter, and the perception of shchitah needs to change," said Chanoch Kesselman, vice-president of the Campaign for the Protection of Shechita, one of the groups, along with the Board of Deputies and the National Council of Shechita Boards, that is part of the new umbrella group.

When shchitah was last seriously threatened in 1985, the government had to deal with a number of different Jewish organizations – an approach that Shechita UK says weakened the community's effectiveness.

"We now speak with one voice, one educated voice," Kesselman said.

Organizers hope that a London-based public relations firm will help them persuade animal rights groups, lawmakers and the public that shchitah is a humane method of slaughter.

The team is led by Shimon Cohen, who is aware from his involvement in previous attempts to outlaw religious slaughter in the United Kingdom that simply defending the right to practise shchitah will not guarantee its place in law.

"The days of merely reacting to the threat to shchitah are over," Cohen said. "What we are going to put out is a positive message, not just a defensive one."

Cohen said he wants Shechita UK to argue that there is no contradiction between the animals' welfare and kosher slaughter.

British legislation on slaughterhouses enshrines the principle that "it is an absolute offence to cause or permit an animal avoidable excitement, pain or suffering."

Both sides are adamant that humane treatment of animals is sacrosanct to their method of slaughter.

Shechita UK points to the fact that a number of scientific studies, most of them American, have concluded that stunning, which is meant to make the animal unconscious before cutting the throat, can sometimes cause great distress. The studies also say that shchitah, in draining the blood quickly by a precision cut, minimizes pain, since consciousness is lost rapidly.

Convincing the Farm Animal Welfare Council (FAWC), the government-sponsored advisory body that wants to outlaw religious slaughter, will be no easy task. Judy MacArthur Clark, chair of FAWC, told JTA her organization's support for stunning is solid.

"There is absolutely no evidence to prove that shchitah is a more humane method of killing an animal than the pre-stunning," said MacArthur Clark, who rejected the validity of the U.S. studies favourable to religious slaughter.

"How can you consider that cutting all the major tissues in an animal's throat will not cause great pain to an animal?" she asked.

So far, the government has not responded officially to FAWC's recommendations – which, although they carry significant scientific and political weight, do not have the power of law.

Nonetheless, MacArthur Clark said she is confident that the authorities would take FAWC's opposition to religious slaughter very seriously.

Another adversary of shchitah is Vegetarians International Voice for Animals, a lobbying group that supports FAWC's stance and recently launched its own campaign against religious slaughter.

The group's associate director Tony Wardle described shchitah as "barbaric."

"It is appalling that in this day and age, a group can defend a medieval practice that has been shown overwhelmingly by scientific study to be inhumane," Wardle told JTA.

Although the animal welfare activist said he would be interested in seeing kosher slaughter in person – an initiative Shechita UK hopes to promote among Jewish and non-Jewish media and activists alike – Wardle said he had seen a video of shchitah that made him "want to vomit."

The British Veterinary Association has also welcomed the FAWC recommendations.

Arafat worth more than a billion: CBS

The CBS program also said that Arafat had accumulated another $1 billion through Israeli bank accounts in which the government of Israel had deposited tax monies it owed the PA under the terms of the Oslo agreements.

According to the program, Forbes magazine has ranked Arafat in sixth place on the list of wealthiest kings, queens and despots.

In related news, the BBC reported last week the PA is transferring up to $50,000 a month to members of the Al-Aqsa Brigades, the military wing of Arafat's Fatah group. A minister in the previous PA government, headed by Mahmoud Abbas, told the BBC the payments were an attempt to prevent Al-Aqsa Brigade members from carrying out suicide bombings.

Abed Al Fatah Hamail, the former PA minister of sport and youth, said he implemented the payment policy, and that Arafat was aware of the transfers, although he did not initiate them. He also said that some terrorists, who worked for the security forces, received and continue to receive salaries, but the cabinet decided over the summer to pay living expenses for terrorists who do not receive salaries to support their families.

When asked how the PA could be certain the money was not being used for terror attacks, Hamail said the sum sent to each activist – $250 – was too small for buying weapons.

In spite of the monetary transfers, Zakaria Zubaydi, an Al-Aqsa Brigades leader interviewed by the BBC, said the organization had not officially declared a ceasefire. Zubaydi said Arafat would not instruct the organization to stop attacks until Israel stops its "assassinations."

WJC poised for organizational overhaul

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — The World Jewish Congress (WJC), an umbrella organization for Jewish communities and groups from 88 countries, is set to undergo a restructuring.

Canadian philanthropist Edgar Bronfman, the president of the WJC for the last 22 years, announced the appointment of a committee, headed by former Tel Aviv University president Prof. Yoram Dinstein, that will make recommendations for organizational and constitutional changes.

The purpose of the reorganization, Bronfman said, is to bring about "democratization and transparency in the [congress'] decision-making process."

The WJC, which was founded in 1936 in Switzerland, has suffered in recent years from a conflict-ridden and complicated image. But the immediate reason for the restructuring is the public furor that broke out over Bronfman's call in a letter to U.S. President George W. Bush last August to pressure Israel on the issue of the security fence.

Following the letter, Bronfman's deputy, Israeli industrialist Izzy Liebler, demanded Bronfman's resignation, and the spate of mudslinging that ensued caused damage to the organization's prestige.

Elan Steinberg, a committee member, told Ha'aretz Sunday that Bronfman recently announced his intention to complete the reform of the WJC before his planned retirement in 2005.

Britain's Conservative Party selects its first Jewish leader

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A former hard-line government minister has become the first Jew ever to lead a major British political party.

Michael Howard, 62, was declared the leader of Britain's opposition Conservative Party last Thursday. No one came forward to challenge him after Tories dumped their previous leader, Iain Duncan Smith, last week.

Geoffrey Alderman, a historian of British Jewry, said Howard's candidacy carried symbolic importance for Britain's Jews, but probably would not bear tangible benefits.

Actually, Alderman said, having a Jewish prime minister could be detrimental to the Jewish community, expressing a concern not unlike those voiced by some U.S. Jews during the 2000 vice-presidential run of Senator Joseph Lieberman.

If Lieberman had become vice-president, Alderman said, some Jews worried he would have had to "bend over backwards on the Middle East" to prove that his religion was not a factor in determining U.S. policy.

"Michael Howard would also be under such pressures" if he became Britain's prime minister, Alderman said. "It is of more benefit to Anglo-Jewry to have a prime minister who represents a Jewish constituency than to have a prime minister who is a professing Jew."

Alderman cited the example of former prime minister Margaret Thatcher, who represented the heavily Jewish London constituency of Finchley.

"She made friends with the Jews and she never looked back," he said. At one time, Thatcher had five Jews in her cabinet – "more than anyone before or since," Alderman said.

Stuart Polak, director of the Conservative Friends of Israel lobbying group, rejected Alderman's suggestion that Howard might be constrained by his Judaism.

"It happens to an extent, but the bottom line is that Michael Howard is someone who will never sell the issues that affect the Jewish community or Israel down the river," he said. "We have somebody who understands the issues affecting the Jewish community better than most."

Sir Malcolm Rifkind, a widely respected former foreign secretary and a possible future Conservative Party leader who is also Jewish, said he, too, did not think Howard's religion would affect a premiership.

"The issue doesn't arise," Rifkind said. "As prime minister, Michael Howard will do what is in the interest of the U.K. There are constraints, but they are national and political, not personal."

The Tories have had an ethnic Jewish leader before, the great 19th-century prime minister Benjamin Disraeli. But Disraeli was baptized a Christian long before he entered politics.

In Disraeli's day there were serious constitutional questions about whether a Jew could be prime minister, Alderman said, since the prime minister advises the monarch on the appointment of Church of England bishops.

After Disraeli, there were no Jewish Conservative lawmakers for generations.

But the anticipated selection of Howard to lead the party more than 120 years after Disraeli has raised no apparent concerns.

The British press has noted his immigrant background – his father came to Wales from Romania in 1939, and one of his grandmothers died in Auschwitz – but it has had little to say about his Jewishness.

Some British Jews, however, say they detected a hint of anti-Semitism in an Oct. 30 story about Howard in the Daily Mail, a solidly Conservative newspaper that supported Howard's candidacy for party leader.

In the story, Edward Heathcoat Amory wrote that Howard "would like to be seen as the very model of that virtually extinct animal, the proper English gentleman. His enemies would complain that he is… bent on passing himself off as something he isn't."

Jewish television personality Vanessa Feltz responded in the next day's Daily Express – the Mail's arch-rival – whose owner, Richard Desmond, is Jewish.

"Heathcoat Amory does not use the 'J' word. He does not come out and call Michael Howard a Jew," Feltz wrote. "What he does instead is to introduce the concept of Michael Howard's Jewishness by stealth. It is articles such as this that give unwitting succor to racists and anti-Semites."

For his part, Howard has made little of his religion, neither hiding it nor making overt displays of it.

In September, he told the London Jewish Chronicle that he "accepted those Jewish values I was brought up with. They are still an important guide and influence on my life."

He is a member of St. John's Wood Liberal synagogue, one of London's flagship Liberal synagogues.

A member of Conservative Friends of Israel, he has opposed efforts by pro-Palestinian lawmakers to demonize the Jewish state.

But the former lawyer is far better known in Britain for his skepticism of the European Union, his conservative fiscal thinking and his law-and-order stance than for his foreign policy positions.

As home secretary – Britain's top law-enforcement official – under John Major from 1993 to 1997, Howard introduced private prisons and pushed for tough sentencing standards.

When Tony Blair – then campaigning to be prime minister – vowed to be "tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime," Howard famously replied, "I know what causes crime: criminals."

That stance will not necessarily harm him among British Jewish voters, who tend to split roughly evenly between Conservative and Labour.

Howard refused to make Holocaust denial a crime when he was home secretary, arguing that to do so would make martyrs of Holocaust deniers.

Howard has vowed to lead the Tories "from the centre," but few political analysts predict he will take the party to victory in the next election, which is expected within two years.

The Tories trail Blair's Labour government by a huge margin in Parliament, and some analysts say Howard's role is to shore up the party and give it a fighting chance to win the election after next.

If Howard does bow out after an election defeat, the Tories may replace him with another Jew – Rifkind or the rising young star Oliver Letwin.

Russian Jews cool on Sharon's call

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon brought a message to Russian Jews when he visited last week: Israel needs you.

But for some Russian Jewish leaders, the message seemed a bit out of step with the times.

During the visit, Sharon's third since becoming prime minister, Sharon met with President Vladimir Putin and other top Russian officials for talks covering the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, international terrorism, Iran's nuclear program and the postwar reconstruction of Iraq.

Sharon and Putin appeared to get along well. Putin acknowledged Israel's desire for peace, and Sharon called Putin a friend of Israel and invited him to visit.

But Sharon's message to 200 Russian Jewish leaders and tycoons at Moscow's Marriott Grand Hotel got a mixed reaction.

Sharon opened his speech with an emotional call for Russian Jews to immigrate to Israel.

"Make aliyah to Israel," Sharon said twice, urging listeners to remember that part of his speech. He also said that those who were not ready to make the move themselves could send their children to study in Israel.

Some of those at the meeting said that, beyond the importance of aliyah, they expected Sharon to mention the successes and needs of the Russian Jewish community, but he didn't touch on any of these topics.

"The audience was expecting to hear something different, not only slogans," said Yuriy Raskin, executive director of the Russian Jewish Congress, which brought 90 community and business leaders to the meeting with Sharon. About the same number of guests were invited to the meeting through the Federation of Jewish Communities of Russia, another umbrella organization.

"To the best of its ability, the Jewish community of Russia is demonstrating its solidarity with the people of Israel," Raskin said. "But what we heard sent us back to the early 1990s."

During the 1990s, hundreds of thousands of Jews moved to Israel from Russia and the other former republics of the Soviet Union. In the past few years, that aliyah has slowed considerably.

"Nothing was said about how, in the view of the prime minister, those who decided to stay in Russia could help Israel," Raskin said. "Many people told me they felt it was a serious mistake. This was quite unexpected."

Sharon also referred to a split in the Russian Jewish community, saying it needs to be united "from within" in order to "take over all our enemies."

Some attendees said it appeared Sharon was less interested in courting Russian Jews than he had been on previous visits.

A top Russian business executive who attended the meeting but did not want to be named said, "Israel is no longer interested in Russian Jewry's political and financial resources, but is only interested in the aliyah numbers."

Others at the meeting disagreed.

"I don't think there was anything in the speech that should be taken as an offence" to Russian Jews, said Tankred Golenpolsky, founder and editor of the International Jewish Gazette in Moscow. "Sharon is drawn so much into the current difficult situation in Israel that there was no need to repeat things that go without saying."

In his speech to the Jewish community leaders, Sharon preferred not to discuss details of his talk several hours earlier with Putin.

Experts agreed that the three-hour meeting with Putin and the talks with Sharon's Russian counterpart, Mikhail Kasyanov, and Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov were successful, and foretold closer co-operation and better understanding between Moscow and Jerusalem.

The annual volume of bilateral trade between the countries has soared in the past decade and now exceeds $1 billion (US), and could reach $1.3 billion by the end of the year, Kasyanov said.

Putin told Sharon that the recent arrest of the Yukos oil company's top manager – a prominent Jew – was not motivated by Mikhail Khodorkovsky's ethnic background.

Putin also told Sharon that Moscow would like to play an active role in mediating the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Responding to Israeli concerns, Putin promised to review a Russian proposal to make the UN Security Council the primary address for the "road map" peace plan. Israel considers the United Nations biased toward the Palestinians, and feels more comfortable letting the United States drive the process.

Putin also indicated that Russia would review its traditional alliance with Arab countries at the United Nations. He also said he would press Syria to rein in Hezbollah, Damascus' proxy in Lebanon, according to media reports.

Russia's promise to review its stand on the road map is important, Golenpolsky said.

"It still remains an open question how it will be reviewed, but the fact that Putin heard and responded to Sharon's concern may well be the most important outcome of this visit," he said.

Israel & the Jewish World

Better late than never, Romania moved to confront Holocaust past

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — The recent establishment of a historical commission to investigate the Holocaust in Romania is part of a belated effort by the government to clean up its act before entering NATO next year.

It also is the fruit of close co-operation between the Romanian government, Jewish organizations and Holocaust research and memorial centres in Israel and the United States.

President Ion Iliescu announced the formation of a Holocaust Commission at a news conference in Bucharest on Oct. 22. The international group of historians, Holocaust survivors and other experts will be headed by Romanian-born Nobel Peace Prize winner Elie Wiesel, who has written widely on his experiences in the Holocaust.

"I am aware that your assignment is hard to accomplish, since there are people who believe that the Holocaust is too sensitive and too complicated an issue to be researched in objectivity, while others respond negatively and allergically to the very idea of the Holocaust," Iliescu told members of the new body.

He also announced that Romania would observe a national Holocaust Remembrance Day, and that efforts would be strengthened to educate Romanians about how, why and where hundreds of thousands of Romanian Jews were killed in the Holocaust.

The commission hopes to offer "to all teachers, students, to all Romanians, as well as historians and international public opinion, documents, studies and other materials needed for knowing and understanding the Holocaust in Romania," Iliescu said.

Romania was allied with Nazi Germany during World War II, and about half of its pre-war Jewish population of about 800,000 was murdered.

In recent years, the anniversaries of pogroms in the northern city of Iasi and in Bucharest have been marked by official commemorations, and several Jewish research centres and education programs have been set up. Relations with Israel are close.

But the deportation of some 240,000 Romanian Jews to concentration camps in what is now Ukraine have largely been ignored. What's more, right-wing nationalist publications spout anti-Semitic rhetoric, and the pro-Nazi World War II leader, Marshal Ion Antonescu, is venerated in some quarters as a Romanian patriot.

Romania is one of seven post-Communist states due to join NATO in May. It also hopes to join the European Union in 2007. That has put its ambiguous record under heightened scrutiny.

"Confronting the Holocaust-era past figured prominently in the NATO accession discussions, certainly in the bilateral exchanges with the U.S.," said Rabbi Andrew Baker, the American Jewish Committee's director for international Jewish affairs.

At one point last year, the U.S. NATO Committee chairman told a Romanian newspaper that right-wing nationalist extremism, anti-Semitism and open nostalgia for the Antonescu regime could hinder Romania's efforts to enter NATO.

In response, the government passed tough legislation last year against the Antonescu cult, and it adopted property restitution measures that addressed both private and communal claims.

"Political leaders in Romania – especially those with an eye on U.S. and international audiences – were aware of the importance of acting and speaking properly on these matters," said Baker, who closely monitored the NATO talks and was part of a team that helped prepare the new Holocaust Commission.

Still, he added, "the sort of open and critical examination of the Holocaust-era past that was taking place in other former Warsaw Pact countries" failed fully to materialize in Romania.

Efforts in other countries included historical commissions in the Baltic states and government legislation and commissions that addressed property claims in Slovakia and the Czech Republic.

In Poland, revelations three years ago that Polish Catholics butchered their Jewish neighbours in the village of Jedwabne touched off nationwide debates on Poland's role in the Holocaust.

Ironically, Baker said, "in some cases where there was a strong ethnic community in Israel that did not look warmly on the present government – for example, Lithuania – the Jewish state could be mobilized to press these issues quite strongly. But in other cases, where the bilateral relationship was a warm one – as was the case with Romania – Israel was far less likely to press Holocaust-era concerns."

The Center for Monitoring and Combating Anti-Semitism in Romania called the government moves against racism and anti-Semitism superficial ploys designed "to recruit Jewish support in the effort to push Romania's interests forward without Romania truly accepting its share of responsibility in the extermination of 20 to 50 per cent of the Jews living in Romania before the war."

Matters came to a head last June, when the government issued a statement that appeared to deny the Holocaust had occurred on Romanian territory

The Foreign Ministry quickly retracted it, but Iliescu himself re-ignited the controversy with comments to the media, including an interview in July with Israel's Ha'aretz in which he appeared to call into question the uniqueness of the Holocaust.

The confusing series of statements and counter-statements prompted an outcry from Israel and the Jewish world and gave impetus to moves aimed at creating the Holocaust commission and other initiatives.

Romanian officials worked with Jewish representatives, including Baker and B'nai Brith International's executive vice president, Daniel Mariaschin – as well as Radu Ioanid, an expert on the Holocaust in Romania at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum – to formulate goals and parameters.

Yad Vashem provided additional input in drawing up concrete guidelines and a work schedule for the commission.

Wiesel agreed to serve as chairman, Baker said, "conditional on key elements – the independence of the commission, unfettered access to all archival material, our or his approval of all designated historians and a commitment to widely disseminate the commission's findings and recommendations."

The commission will hold a conference every six months in Jerusalem, Washington, D.C., or Bucharest, and a summary report will be submitted by the end of 2005.

"We would like to give Romania a clear picture of what the Holocaust meant, with rigorous analysis, data and photos," Ioanid, who will be vice president of the commission, told Reuters.

"The public will understand what happened in the past if the findings of the investigation are properly disseminated."

United Synagogue Day School

Early Years Centre of Excellence

In the fall of 2000, United Synagogue Day School founded the Early Years Centre of Excellence. By embracing the Multiple Intelligences model as part of the best early childhood teaching practices already in place at USDS, the school adopted a more innovative way to promote literacy and numeracy in their early years classrooms. The results have been extremely positive and the school is proud of the children's accomplishments.

According to Lucy Cohen, Head of School, "It is a well known fact that literacy and numeracy are the cornerstones of education and the most precious tools with which we can equip our children in their vital early learning years. These are the pathways to future learning. They will provide students with essential foundations for skill building and positive self-esteem."

"Differentiated instruction" is the method primarily employed by the Early Years Centre of Excellence at USDS. By using this technique, the teacher considers every child's individual interest, learning style and level of maturity at a very early learning stage.

The most crucial element of Multiple Intelligences theory involves using children's strengths to overcome weaknesses. At USDS, staff alter their teaching strategies to better reflect the needs of different learners. Cohen feels certain that the program provides the opportunity for "a child to learn in his or her own special way. When the child learns what type of learner she is, she is more motivated to succeed and has a better grasp of the concepts involved. For example, suppose a child has a weak grasp of numbers, but a strong sense of rhythm: he may find counting easier if it is associated with rhythms in music."

The centre was launched with consultants Lorraine Sandler and Dr. Karen Oster. Sandler, former Pre-School Principal at Holy Blossom for 17 years, and Oster, a development psychologist, founder of Play and Learn, brought a wealth of experience to the project. Year one involved the consultants familiarizing the teachers with tracking and assessment tools; encouraging literacy and numeracy through class play; and providing support for flexible grouping of children based on their individual learning styles.

As of the 2003/2004 school year, the program is in full operation in every JK, SK and Grade 1 class across all three campuses. It is an integral part of the school's culture and will continue to be instituted in all grades.

According to Dr. Oster and Sandler, the research validates this approach. "There are many ways we both enhance and monitor the success of the program. Along with the teachers tracking students' results by use of developmental inventory and checklists, the children's progress is recorded and parent-teacher conferences are held twice in each academic year. Newly designed Early Years Report Cards with detailed information on literacy, numeracy, and learning styles chart the progress of the children. A most valuable instrument has been the Cumulative Student Profile which gathers information about a child from JK on and is then passed to the child's next year's teachers, forming a comprehensive tracking document for every student. This has been extremely helpful for the teachers."

There is no doubt that by realizing that every child is unique, educators are better able to support their students in the pursuit of their particular interests. When students are accepted for who they are and how they learn, the classroom will be a place where diversity of all kinds is celebrated and encouraged, and each individual will be able to excel in his/her own unique and creative way. The USDS Early Years Centre of Excellence has enabled United Synagogue Day School, as leaders at the forefront of day school education, to fulfill these goals with the utmost success and pride and to prepare its students for the world they will face ahead.

Toronto woman loses 60 pounds, turns "fat" blouses into quilt

"I made this quilt out of old fat blouses I used to wear. I've lost quite a few sizes — maybe 3 or 4.

The biggest benefit is that I now have normal blood pressure. I'm no longer on medication for it. I have more energy. I can tie up my shoes without huffing and puffing when I bend over.

During this program I have become positive about everything in my life — not just about my weight loss success. Why not give it a try?"

Alon Blumberger kicks 20-year habit!

"My goal originally was to just quit smoking. However, I was able to reduce my stress AND quit smoking. Hypnosis changed my life."

Physician stops noshing!

"I lost 5 pounds in the first week. It's been very easy and the weight loss has been steady. I stopped snacking after dinner. Before hypnosis I felt ... that I couldn't control my eating habits, even though, as a physician, I knew how it would affect my health."

Food with flair at the Betel Centre

Helen's culinary creations come with down-East spice

Chef Daniel Bresca is the creative talent behind the Centre's popular menu and delicious foods.

Helen Freedman's recipe for...

Haligonian Ginger Snaps

¾ cup Crisco shortening
1 cup sugar
1 egg, unbeaten
¼ cup molasses
2 cups all-purpose flour
1½ teaspoon baking soda
1 teaspoon ground cloves
1 teaspoon cinnamon
1½ teaspoon ground ginger
1 tablespoon sugar, scant

Preheat oven to 350. Cream shortening. Add sugar, cream thoroughly. Add egg and molasses and beat until smooth. In a separate bowl, combine flour, baking soda and spices and sift into creamed mixture. Mix well. Roll dough by hand into balls (¾ to 1" in diameter); dip the top of each ball in sugar. Bake on ungreased cookie sheet for 16 minutes. Makes 48-56 cookies. Cookies will crinkle on top – and look like "bought" cookies.

Helen Freedman is most passionate when she's talking about two things -- community service and food. At the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, she has combined her passions for both.

Originally from Halifax, Helen, 83, holds a degree in home economics and lived in Montreal for most of her married life. There, she worked for B'nai Brith and other organizations, writing and publishing recipes and food articles, publicizing events and lecturing on food-related subjects.

In the 1960's, with Noreen Gilletz, she was among the original editors of the highly successful Second Helpings, Please cookbook.

When Helen and her husband, Harvey, moved to Toronto in 1991 to be near their two daughters, she found herself missing her active life. Harvey had no problem, she says. "He's a computer bug ... and he collects miniature trains." But Helen needed a community connection, and in 1992, she found it at the Betel Centre.

Intrigued by weekly Lifelong Learning Institute (LLI) lectures and events like Literary Luncheons and Current Events, Helen found her niche right away. "I immediately became a member of the LLI committee, and helped with organizing special functions, especially events with food."

In 2000, she was elected chair of the food services committee, making her part of the decision-making of the Betel Centre. She works closely with Chef Daniel Bresca on all food-related issues.

Helen says Bresca is responsive to member suggestions. "He's now offering salads, chicken sandwiches" in the cafeteria. His baked apples are a highlight, she says, but his salmon, available every Wednesday, "is out of this world."

Helen is also the dynamo behind Café Europa, a monthly program for Holocaust survivors, jointly sponsored by Jewish Family and Child Service and the Betel Centre. She co-ordinates volunteers and food, while JF&CS arranges entertainment. "Last year," Helen says, "we went from [serving] 35 to 70 people, offering a social environment ... complete with a full-course meal and entertainment."

Helen always has a special smile for children, and loves intergenerational workshops with students. She recently received her 10-year pin from North York General Hospital, where she is a play therapy volunteer with sick kids. "That is a fun thing," she says.

At home, Helen enjoys cooking for family events and holidays. She's known for her brisket and for "booboo beer," a French-Canadian chicken ragout, but they all have a sweet spot for desserts like her ginger snaps and apple cake. And she always tries to add a down-East Haligonian (person from Halifax) flair. "They're very good cooks in the Maritimes."

It's a long drive from her Don Mills home, but Helen says she gladly drops by the Betel Centre several times a week to visit friends, participate in meetings or take in an LLI event. After renovations this summer, she finds even more reasons to make the trip. "Now that the Centre is fixed up, I can't stop raving about it."

Always up for new challenges, Helen has already registered for a January computer course in the senior-friendly Computer Learning and Re-source Centre. "I'm looking forward to it," she grins. "Working on state-of-the-art computers, instead of my husband's hand-me-downs.

"Joining (the Betel Centre) was one of the best things that could have happened to me," Helen says. Ever the food buff, she describes her immediate connection in food terms: "Everything 'gelled.' I've made wonderful friends. It's a delight to come here."

Andrew Cohen bestseller in running for GG prize

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

In his recent book While Canada Slept: How We Lost Our Place in the World, Ottawa writer Andrew Cohen examines what he calls "our three D's" – defence, diplomacy, development.

He presents irrefutable evidence of our declining influence and reputation in these spheres, and he suggests that it's time for us to regain some of this lost ground.

Andrew Cohen

The book's persuasive arguments, political insights and solid historical perspective have earned it a place on national bestseller lists. But it also earned a much rarer distinction when it was recently nominated for a Governor General's Award for non-fiction, one of only five books short-listed from more than 200 submissions. The winner is due to be announced this week.

An associate professor at Carleton University's school of journalism, Cohen is a columnist for the Ottawa Citizen and a former reporter for the Globe and Mail. A Montreal native, he attended McGill University and later concentrated on international studies at Cambridge University in England.

Much of his book focuses on what he calls "the golden age of Canadian diplomacy" – an age defined by the contributions of three particular diplomats, Hume Wrong, Norman Robertson and Lester Pearson. Cohen calls them "the finest of their generation, blessed with an imagination and ambition that defined their country in the eyes of the world in the middle decades of the 20th century."

Through their collective effort, these men helped Canada reach a zenith of influence and importance in the international sphere in the 1950s and 1960s. While Canada Slept documents the country's slow and steady decline in the intervening years.

Canada, besides being a leading peacekeeper, was a leading military power after World War II, with the fourth-largest armed forces in the world, Cohen points out. Today, we contribute fewer soldiers to the United Nations than Portugal, Ghana, Nepal and Bangladesh, and our defence budget has been slashed. Canada's foreign service and foreign aid contributions have also decreased, according to Cohen, who assigns a significant amount of blame for this to the government of Prime Minister Jean Chrétien for the slide.

"There's a focus on Chrétien in this book," he told The CJN. "I call him the most parochial prime minister since the early Mackenzie King, since I think that he was essentially not engaged in foreign policy at all."

(As for Chrétien's recent readiness to shake the hand of an anti-Semitic foreign head of state, the recently retired Malaysian prime minister Mahathir Mohamad? "It was unwise," Cohen said. "He seems to not understand the meaning of these things.")

Fortunately, Cohen, 48, does see some light at the end of the tunnel.

"I'm hoping that we'll start talking about foreign policy again," he said, "and that we'll find the money and the country will once again find our place in the world… It will take a great deal of contemplation and resourcefulness to be the people we can be."

A recipient of many distinguished awards, Cohen wrote a 1990 book on the Meech Lake Accord and co-edited a collection of essays on Pierre Elliott Trudeau. While Canada Slept grew out of a presentation he made to the House of Commons standing committee on foreign affairs and international trade in the aftermath of 9/11.

The 220-page hardcover book is published by McClelland and Stewart and sells for $31.99.

Film explores life of surrealist painter

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Samuel Bak is a painter whose Holocaust experiences have greatly influenced him as an artist.

A child prodigy from Vilna, Bak is a surrealist whose works examine the themes of cruelty, morality, memory, loss and uprootedness.

Christa Singer's empathetic documentary, Samuel Bak: Painter of Questions, will be broadcast by TVOntario on Thursday Nov. 20, at 10 p.m. and repeated on Sunday, Nov. 23, at 1 a.m.

The 60-minute film is a portrait of a sensitive, gifted man consumed by the searing event that altered his life and caused the death of his loved ones.

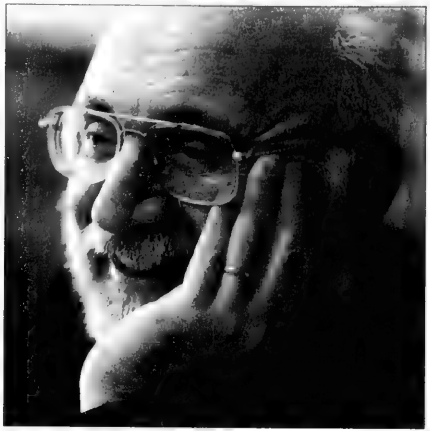
Bak, who brings a classical sensibility to his work, was already a budding painter at the age of three. Fortunately for Bak, his parents encouraged him to develop his talents.

When he was eight years old, he and his mother were dispatched to the squalor of the Vilna ghetto. They escaped and found refuge in a Benedictine monastery. After eight months, they returned to the ghetto, a fact that goes unexplained in the film.

In the aftermath of the war, Bak lived in a displaced persons camp in Landsberg, Germany.

After leaving the camp, Bak lived in Israel, Switzerland, Italy, France and the United States. He currently lives in Weston, Mass., near Boston.

In the film, the importance of his paintings are explained by Boston art gallery owner Bernard Pucker and Holocaust scholar and survivor Lawrence Langer. Bak's works reflect not only the wretched human condition, but they also conjure up "the shadows" of his family in Vilna, we're told.



Samuel Bak is a surrealist whose works examine the themes of cruelty, morality, memory and loss.

The highlight of the film turns on his return visit to Vilna after a very long absence.

At first, Bak refuses to consider the idea of going back home. "Absolutely impossible," he staunchly maintains. But at the urging of a Lithuanian colleague, he returns, accompanied by his wife and three daughters.

Once in Vilna, he presides over a retrospective exhibit of his work and visits the Ponari forest, where his father and grandparents perished.

Samuel Bak: Painter of Questions leaves several aspects of his life unexplored – deliberately so, one suspects. But on balance, this is a finely-crafted film about a talented painter whose spiritual wounds have never really healed.

New spa location

By ELAINE COHEN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI BEACH — Two weeks before Gerda Rosner's Spa Connection was to return to Montreal from Miami in April 2003, Rosner and her group learned the Lido Spa Hotel had been sold.

When Abbey Berkowitz, who runs the Saxony Hotel & Resort on the ocean in Miami Beach, got word of Rosner's quest, he made her an offer she couldn't refuse.

"At the Saxony, we will enjoy all the amenities we had at the Lido Spa Hotel and more," said Rosner. " Here we will be able to take advantage of the beach and boardwalk right at our door. Spa-goers will be able to book facials, massages and hot packs. Besides, guests can take advantage of all the existing activities and attractions available at the Saxony Hotel."

The Saxony has 400 guest rooms and can seat more than 1,000. Rosner's Spa Connection entourage will be seated together in the dining room.

Card and games rooms, a beauty salon, an Olympic size swimming pool, and numerous other amenities are available. Rosner will continue to offer aerobics classes.

Between Rosner's unique fitness program and the hotel's existing schedule, guests will be able to participate in aqua fitness, line dancing, low impact aerobics, Tai Chi, yoga and tennis classes.

Rosner will stay at the Saxony Hotel & Resort from November 23 to mid-April. Special prices are available for Rosner's Spa Connection from November 23 until late January, when prices change. Once again after March 3, specials are scheduled. The Saxony Hotel & Resort is situated at 3201 Collins Avenue. For info call 1-866-489-4148.

Walrus editor savours magazine's strong debut

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The Walrus, Canada's newest magazine, is David Berlin's dream come true.

The Israeli-born Berlin is the co-founder and editor of The Walrus, hyped as the Canadian equivalent of such high-brow American publications as Harper's and The Atlantic Monthly.

Indeed, The Walrus boasts an impressive roster of writers, including such literati as Margaret Atwood, Canada's pre-eminent woman of letters, and Harper's editor Lewis Lapham.

The Toronto-based magazine debuted at the end of September, and Berlin says he is thrilled with the reception to its maiden issue.

"It's amazing how well it's been received. We've got 25,000 subscribers and we sold out the first week. For one issue, that's amazing."

In response, he says, publisher Ken Alexander has increased the print run of the second issue, which hits the newsstands Nov. 14.

Like a proud father Berlin, can't stop smiling when he talks about The Walrus. This baby was conceived in the course of many late-night marathon discussions with co-founder Alexander.

Each man dreamed of creating a Canadian cultural and political magazine that would attract highly acclaimed writers from Canada and elsewhere. For his part, Berlin even went so far as to seek support from Lapham in New York.

Berlin and associate publisher Bernard Schiff, a retired University of Toronto psychology professor, had been exploring the possibility of establishing a Canadian edition of Harper's. But the project took on an independent identity once Berlin and Alexander connected.

Berlin's sister-in law told a friend about Berlin's idea. The friend happened to know about Alexander's interest in starting a similar type of magazine, and a shidduch was quickly arranged.

Not only was this a meeting of like minds, but Alexander was able to raise money for the project, Berlin says. "I was incredibly lucky to have found Ken."

Alexander applied to the Chawkers Foundation, which was established by his father Charles in 1988. Chawkers gave the fledgling magazine a $5-million grant over five years.

The Walrus also received funding from the George Cedric Metcalf Foundation for a student intern program headed by Schiff.

For Berlin, the financial war chest gives the magazine the resources to publish investigative stories with extensive research. He cites the cover story of the first issue as an example.

He says the 12,000-word exposé on Canada Steamship Lines – which Liberal leader-in-waiting Paul Martin built into a company with $700 million in assets before transferring ownership to his sons to satisfy opposition conflict-of-interest charges – created a lot of buzz in Ottawa. Politicians of all stripes were requesting advance copies because much of the information in the article was new.

In fact, the National Post quoted the article in one of its news stories, he adds. "We sold out because of that Paul Martin piece."

Berlin says it's a prime example of the high-quality research and investigative work readers can expect from The Walrus.

"There's more respect in this country for bold honesty than one would think. That's the lesson we're learning."

The left-leaning Berlin – he ran for the federal NDP in the 2000 election – stresses the magazine does not reflect his political views.

"We have complete respect for the reader. We don't tell people what to think. We let them draw their own conclusions.

"The most creative place is down the centre, with left and right weighted down with equal power. That's a difficult line to tow."

But political stories are just part of the magazine's mix, which also includes arts, culture and humour, reflecting Berlin's own varied background.

A former editor of the Literary Review of Canada, Berlin has a master's degree in philosophy and political science from York University, and he's done graduate work at the University of Chicago on its Committee for Social Thought. He's also run several businesses and is still involved in an innovative cardiac clinic in North York.

"For a guy like me, being editor of The Walrus is the best job in the world. I'm an eclectic thinker with interests in medicine, music, the arts. And I'm a political animal by nature.

"With the diversity of the subject matter in the magazine, I don't have to parse myself."

The job satisfaction can be measured on many levels, he says.

"It's amazing how everything has come together. I'm working with great people. I have a great staff.

"And Ken is extremely dedicated to the project. It's most extraordinary. He shares my vision of The Walrus."

Post-traumatic stress disorder common in SARS' workers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Health-care workers who have dealt with SARS have a higher incidence of post-traumatic stress disorder than journalists who have covered a war zone, says the director of infection control at Mount Sinai Hospital.

"There is still a great deal of anxiety and fear amongst [these] workers. The impact of SARS has been enormous," says Dr. Alison McGeer, also infection control consultant at Baycrest Centre and Scarborough Hospital.

McGeer was speaking at a recent panel sponsored by the health issues committee of National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section. Also on the panel was Dr. Barbara Yaffe, director of communicable disease control for the City of Toronto, and microbiologist Michael Brodsky.

She said North York General and Scarborough Grace hospitals have been absolutely devastated by the outbreak, and that the tourism industry has been greatly affected with a huge number of jobs lost.

"It is going to take a long time to recover."

Health officials have learned from the SARS outbreak that they were simply not ready to manage the outbreak of a communicable disease, she said.

"We didn't have adequate systems in place in the hospitals or in the community, and our emergency departments were not built in a way as to prevent the spread of disease.

"[While dealing with SARS], we took a huge hit in our ability to care for non-SARS patients. We had so many people focused on controlling the outbreak that we were not organized for other issues."

'We didn't have adequate systems in place to prevent the spread of disease'

A network is urgently needed to deal with such an issue on a global level, she said.

"The people in China knew about the outbreak, but they didn't talk about it. They did not see what the impact would be."

Yaffe said the amount of manpower that went into dealing with SARS was unprecedented. "We had 700 people working full time for 3½ months. There has never been an emergency that has lasted that long."

In that time, she said, they received more than 300,000 calls to their hotline with a one-day high of 47,567 calls.

Another lesson learned from the outbreak, Yaffe said, is that there is desperate need for a better information-technology system.

"We need active surveillance for this type of illness. We need a mechanism for rapid reporting, and we need to disseminate timely information properly."

Group helps frum parents with at-risk kids

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A support group for Orthodox parents with at-risk children – an offshoot of the Association of Parent Support Groups of Toronto – is marking about three years of supporting the needs of the frum community.

Group spokesperson Stephanie Wagman explained that while several Orthodox participants had belonged to the secular association, many felt there was a need for a support group geared to the problems they face, where advice would conform to halachah and they could interact with people with the same worldview.

The problems facing these parents are beyond the normal kinds of acting-out by teenagers, Wagman stressed.

Some have run away, some refuse to obey their curfew or the rules of their homes – "They are rebelling against their parents, and using religion to do it," Wagman said – and some have turned to drugs.

One of the more dramatic examples Wagman cited was of two young teenage girls from haredi families in New York City who headed to Arizona in clothing that is unacceptably revealing in their community. Fortunately, they were found safe and returned to their families.

Wagman said participants in the Toronto support group discuss how others have coped with similar problems, and they share information on professionals who are available to help. They also exchange phone numbers and are available to help or comfort each other any time of the day or night.

Dealing with an at-risk child is "a very isolating experience," Wagman said, citing the fact the Orthodox community can be very judgmental and parents tend to be blamed for a child's problems.

Orthodox families face unique problems in such situations, she said, as difficulty with one child can affect a family's standing in the community, and can even have an impact on marriage prospects of siblings and other relatives.

Every week, six to 12 people attend group meetings at the offices of JACS, a support and information group with offices at Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue. (The group operates independently of JACS.)

While both men and women are welcome, Wagman said "men don't reach out as easily."

It is important "to have a safe place to talk," Wagman said, adding that the group stresses confidentiality.

"I can say that I go to this group, but no one else can say that I go there."

Bone-crunching blueliner back after injury

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Jake Heller won't be found anywhere near the top of the Ontario Hockey League's scoring charts this season, but opposing skaters will surely remember who the hulking defenceman is the next time they venture into the Erie Otters' end of the ice.

The 6-3, 215-pound blueliner is once again throwing his weight around, delivering crunching bodychecks and generally using his size to his advantage as much as possible.

> Heller models his game after Chris Chelios, a player he idolizes for his robust game

It's something the 18-year-old is going to enjoy after being sidelined for all but the final 10 games of last season while recovering from a lacerated kidney.

Heller suffered the injury in a game when he took a cross check to the back. He underwent two surgeries, including one to remove a fluid sac around his kidney that was compressing it.

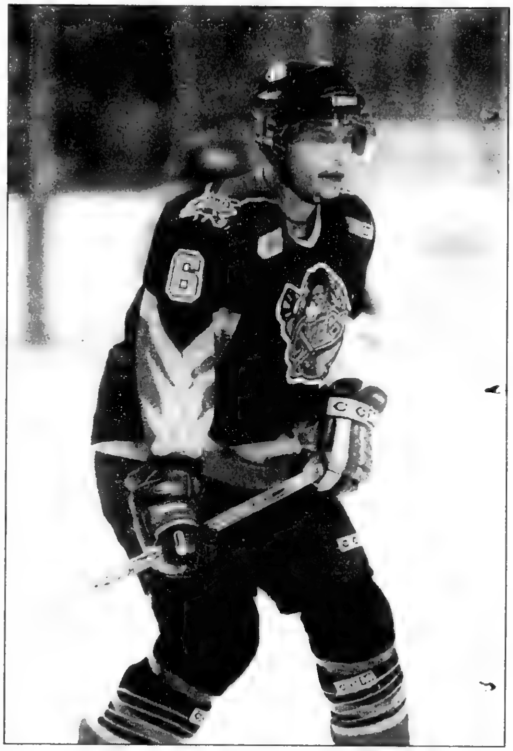
Any type of physical activity was forbidden while he recovered, but Heller hung around with the team in Erie, Pa., anyway, bonding with his teammates and gaining valuable experience as part of the club.

"It was tough for me last year, but I just had to do it," he says. "It's something I had no choice in. Being with the team was good for me, but it feels really good to get back out there."

He finished up high school while recuperating and is currently taking a couple of courses at Edinboro University to keep himself busy outside of hockey.

A native of Skokie, Ill., a Chicago suburb that's home to many Jews, Heller started skating at age four and has been playing shinny since he turned five.

He says he tries to model his game after former Blackhawks and now Red Wings defenceman Chris Chelios, a player he idolizes for his robust game.



Jake Heller

During a four-game holiday recall as a 16-year-old from his Wellington Dukes bantam club during the Otters' 2001-02 championship season, he played so well that Erie managing partner Sherry Bassin touted him as a possible future NHLer.

Heller's Dukes won the Tier II Junior A Conference Championship in 2001-02. He was acquired by Erie as the 80th selection overall in the 2001 OHL Priority Selection. He's just now in his draft-eligible year.

"Jake would have definitely been with us if the rules were what they are now," Otters coach Dave MacQueen recently told the Erie Times-News, referring to a stipulation that at the time limited rosters to two underage players. It has since been changed to allow three 16-year-olds on a team.

Expected to be a regular on the blue line last season, Heller sat out the first 58 games and probably wished at the time that he had sat out one more. His season debut on Feb. 24 was an 8-0 loss to Windsor.

Though he says he's still getting used to the speed of the game after a prolonged absence from the lineup, he is pain-free and feeling a little bit better every day.

While the club has struggled to a 6-9-1 start, last in the OHL's Midwest Division, Heller has a goal and is near the team lead with a plus-3 rating – pretty good for a team that has given up seven more goals than it's scored.

"I'm not really an offensive-minded guy," he said. "I stay back, try to keep [the other team] from scoring. I think [plus-minus] is a pretty important stat for me the way I play. It shows what you're doing on the ice."

New Argos owners have strong ties to Jewish community

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The new owners of the Toronto Argonauts are not only successful entrepreneurs and longstanding fans of three-down football, they've also been intensely involved in the Jewish community.

Developer Howard Sokolowski, CEO of Tribute Communities, and David Cynamon, head of KIK Corporation, were named last week as new owners of the storied CFL franchise.

In addition to their success in business, both have also played key roles in community fundraising efforts.

Sokolowski, 51, served as co-chair of the United Jewish Appeal's 2003 "Israel Emergency" campaign, which raised an unprecedented $65 million. The campaign was Toronto UJA's most successful yet and ranked third among North American Jewish communities last year, said UJA Federation spokesperson Wendy Lampert.

Cynamon, 40, served as co-chair of the UJA's goods and services division. "He's a very, very strong supporter of the Jewish community," Lampert said.

Three years ago, Sokolowski pulled a full-page ad from the Toronto Star as a protest against its coverage of the Middle East conflict. At the time, Sokolowski told The CJN, "whether it was successful or not, we wanted to make a statement.

"I'm uncomfortable with a lot of the coverage the Star has given the Middle East situation. I'd settle for them being impartial. I see them as pro Palestinian."

In announcing their acquisition of the Argos last week, the two said they would focus on the long-term health of the franchise.

"There's no question that we have love for the game, that we are fans first and foremost, but make no mistake about this, we're not here for the short term, we're here for the long term," Sokolowski said.

"We do believe there is an opportunity, a very strong opportunity, as a business or else we would not be as interested," he added.

The ownership announcement set off a round of media speculation, with pundits suggesting a new stadium, built near York University or on the Exhibition grounds, is key to the team's future success.

The Argonauts are believed to have lost $50 million since 1991, and while terms of the purchase were not announced, it was rumoured the team was acquired for a $2.5 million franchise fee and a $10 million assurance.

At a news conference announcing their conditional purchase of the team (it takes effect after the Grey Cup), Cynamon stressed the pair's local roots. No owner of the team has been locally based since 1981.

Sokolowski is founder and CEO of Tribute Communities, one of the largest home builders in Canada, with more than 20,000 built to date. The award-winning company is also a strong supporter of community charities. It has raised more than $500,000 for the Ajax-Pickering Hospital and supports other medical and community facilities.

Sokolowski is a member of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation's board of directors and a board member of the Rouge Valley Health System. In 1999, he was a member of the consortium that purchased SkyDome.

Cynamon, a native of Edmonton, was hired by his father-in-law, the late Gerald Pencer, founder of Cott Corp., to turn around KIK, which at the time was a struggling company manufacturing private label bleaches and detergents.

Cynamon acquired a network of producers and signed up a roster of important clients, including Wal-Mart, K-Mart, Albertsons, Publix, A&P and many others. KIK is now North America's largest producer of private label bleach and a leader in the liquid household cleanser category.

Cynamon has been named Canadian entrepreneur of the year by Ernst & Young and KIK has been twice recognized as one of the Canada's 50 best-managed companies.

Cynamon also sits on the board of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation and played university football for the York University Yeomen in the mid-1980s.

ספרותנו

יעל זליגר

אני לא מה שאתם חושבים, מאת: אורית רז; ראשית קריאה, הוצאת כתר

"מי אני בעצם" כך פותחת אורית רז את ספורה הנוגע ללב על ילד ששמו יוני. יוני הוא ילד נבון, רגיש, בעל דמיון מפותח אך סובל מקשיי למידה. "כל אחד חושב אותי למשהו אחר ואומר עלי דברים אחרים. אבא ואמא למשל. הם אומרים לפעמים שאני הילד הכי נהדר והכי חכם בעולם... הילדים בכתה אומרים עלי שאני תינוק ועצלן. ומר פוגל הזקן, השכן שלנו... טוען שיש לי יאלטר קופי זאת אומרת ראש זקן, ושאפשר להסביר לי כל דבר ממש כמו שמסבירים לאדם מבגר." אכן, מר פוגל הוא מהיחידים שאינו רואה ביוני ילד "בעייתי". איך אומר מר פוגל: "לכל אחד יש קוצים, רק שלא תמיד הקוצים נראים ממש כמו קוצים."

יוני נכשל במבחנים, עבודתו מאוד איטית וכתב ידו אינו קריא. "הילדים" הוא מספר, "בטוחים שזה מפני שאני עצלן ותינוק... אני ממש לא יכול לסבול את זה. כל פעם בשעורים אני חושב על זה ואומר לעצמי: זה לא נכון, זה פשוט לא נכון!"

בעיקרו של דבר הספר הוא מעין מונולוג של ילד דיסלקטי, מתוסכל, כעוס ומבוהל. כילדים אחרים במצבים דומים, יוני מפתח מנגנוני בריחה מהמציאות. ביום עצוב באופן מיוחד, כאשר יוני חש השפלה קשה על כך שאף אחד מהבנים לא רצה בו כשחקן כדור סל בקבוצתו, יוני מדמיין לעצמו חבר סודי בשם נוסנוס. "נוסנוס הוא החבר הכי טוב שיש לי, החבר היחיד שלי והוא תמיד בא לעזרתי." לנוסנוס מראה חיצוני משונה; איש קטן, עם כרס וקרחת כשבקצוות מבצבץ שיער שיבה אפור וארוך. עיניו כחולות, קורצות בשובבות.

מדי פעם עושה אמו של יוני מאמץ לעודד את בנה. היא מספרת לו על כל מיני אנשים מוכשרים ומצליחים כמו צ'רצ'יל ואדיסון שבילדותם סבלו מדיסלקציה. בעצם גם יוני יודע שהוא איננו חסר כישורים; "אני לא תלמיד איום. אני יודע ומבין כל מה שלומדים בכיתה. הכל. רק שבכתיבה ובקריאה אני חלש... אפילו לא יודעים כמה אני טוב בחשבון. בלוח הכפל אני זריז כמו שד." וליוני אף זכרון מצויין. אלא שסביבתו החברתית של יוני רואה בו כשלון ובה אין יוני מוצא תמיכה. עד כדי כך גדול כאבו שהוא מקנא בילד נכה ששמו יובל. יובל נפגע בתאונת דרכים ומאז הוא משותק ברגליו אלא שליובל אף אחד לא לועג. המום של יובל גלוי לכולם; "את הבעיה שלי לעומת זאת, אף אחד לא רואה." אף אחד, חוץ מנוסנוס.

ככל שבדידותו של יוני מעצימה כך מגיח נוסנוס בדמיונו לעתים תכופות יותר. ההזדקקות הגוברת לנוסנוס היא ביחס ישיר להחרפת מצבו של יוני.

אני לא מה שאתם חושבים מאת אורית רז איננו ספר מתח הרפתקני. זהו ספר דידקטי שכתוב בצורה שתעניין ילדים. מן הסתם לבטח יבטא הסיפור את עולמם של ילדים רבים, לאו דווקא דיסלקטים, המתמודדים על מקומם בחברה ההשגית שבה אנו חיים.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman

Jewish law has long recognized the right of workers to form unions. One of the basic rights of a union is the right to strike. Without it, a union effectively ceases to have any power to protect its workers. But modern authorities dispute the extent to which Jewish law recognizes this right. Where contractual obligations or even customary amenities are being ignored, all agree a strike would be allowed. However, striking for such things as higher wages or increased benefits is prohibited, according to many authorities. In such situations, a union may only demand binding arbitration.

Rabbi Moshe Feinstein rules that in a situation where a strike is allowed (which, in his opinion, includes striking for higher wages or increased benefits), unionized workers may actually prevent, through peaceful means, the hiring of replacement workers. He bases his ruling partially on the negative feeling people have toward "scab" labour.

Workers in essential services, such as hospitals and public safety, are prohibited to strike. From a Jewish perspective, there is no greater essential service than students having the opportunity to learn. This is especially true regarding Torah study. Our sages declare that "the world exists only because of the speech of students in school." Denying students the right to learn is tantamount to destroying the world.

Furthermore, Rabbi Feinstein notes that Jewish law requires teachers, in theory, to perform their sacred task for free. They are paid "opportunity cost," a salary equivalent to what they could have earned had they applied their talents elsewhere. Since they are not paid for teaching per se, striking for higher wages would not be allowed. Rabbi Feinstein does say that in situations where teachers are paid "starvation wages," a situation that unfortunately was not uncommon in years past, they may be permitted to strike "for a day or two."

In my opinion, the prohibition of teacher strikes would also apply to extracurricular activities, as these are vital to the development of balanced children. While one may not be required to become a teacher, those who choose to do must agree to sacrifice some of the rights enjoyed by others. Hopefully the rewards will make it worthwhile.

SPOTLIGHTING Our Talent!

If enthusiasm and dedication are a prerequisite for heading up the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes, then Dr. Bernard Zinman has what it takes. As Director of the Centre, Dr. Zinman has two goals: the first is to provide care to people with diabetes, the second is researching the causes and health implications of this rapidly growing problem.

"Diabetes is the epidemic of the new millennium," says Dr. Zinman. "It is a serious condition that causes disabling, long-term conditions. By the year 2025, an estimated 280 million people worldwide will have diabetes."

In addition to his duties as Director, Dr. Zinman also holds the Sam and Judy Pencer Family Chair in Diabetes, is a Senior Scientist at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute at Mount Sinai Hospital, and is a Professor of Medicine at the University of Toronto. His research program has several themes including unraveling the basic causes for the long-term complications of diabetes, developing strategies to prevent diabetes in susceptible individuals, exploring new therapies for diabetes, and understanding the recent epidemic of diabetes in native communities.

People interested in participating in diabetes research can call Debbi at (416) 586-4447.

The Rebecca MacDonald Centre for Arthritis and Autoimmune Disease opens

Staff and friends from the community gathered at Mount Sinai's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Building on October 15th to celebrate the opening of the Rebecca MacDonald Centre for Arthritis and Autoimmune Disease. Arthritis and autoimmune diseases are among the most common health problems today. Nearly four million Canadians or one in six adults suffer from rheumatoid arthritis, osteoarthritis, lupus or one of the other 110 forms of arthritis.

The one-of-a-kind clinical research and outpatient facility will serve more than 15,000 patients annually. The development of the Centre was made possible through the generosity of Rebecca MacDonald. Ms. Macdonald, Chair, President, and CEO of Energy Savings Income Fund, is one of the only patients in the world known to make a complete recovery from rheumatoid arthritis and remain off medication. She attributes her recovery to her determination to 'get better' and willingness to try novel therapies.

"I'm confident that our collaborative research program in genetics, outcomes, and therapies will have a major impact on the future health care of Canadians and people worldwide," said Rheumatologist Dr. Edward Keystone, Director of the MacDonald Centre for Arthritis and Autoimmune Disease. "The Centre will integrate clinical patient care and research in arthritis and autoimmune disease which will provide patients with the most advanced care and treatment options."

The Auxiliary Celebrates Fifty Years

On October 20th, close to 260 Auxiliary members and friends were on hand as the Auxiliary kicked off its 50th Anniversary year with an afternoon Tea at the Windsor Arms Hotel. The wonderful afternoon was organized by Co-Chairs Harriett Bomza and Gail Gerstein together with Vice President Ofra Menkes and their committee. The venue was made available thanks to Windsor Arms President George Friedmann. Large collages which hung from the hotel's columns chronicled the Auxiliary's history and provided opportunity for the guests to reminisce on the last fifty years.

"It is the camaraderie, teamwork, and enthusiasm that make the Auxiliary so special," said Auxiliary President, Heather Gotlieb. She announced the recent establishment of The Rose Torno Chair in Obstetrics and Gynecology, in honour of the late Rose Torno, visionary and founder of the Auxiliary. Canadian solidarity mission salutes Israel

Canada's largest mission to Israel since 1996 began last week at Palmachim air force base near Tel Aviv with a star-studded celebration of the ties between the two countries.

The "Canada Salutes Israel" event was attended by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Canada's Ambassador to Israel Donald Sinclair and Air Force Maj.-Gen. Dan Halutz, as well as 700 Canadian mission members from across the country, 50 Canadian Birthright Israel participants and 700 Israeli air force personnel.

"Israel puts itself on the line for us every day of the week, every week of the year," said Stephen Goldhar, co-chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's B'yachad (Together) Mission, which alone accounted for some 300 of the 700 Canadians.

"We wanted to say thank you and show our solidarity, and this is the most tangible way to show Israelis we're here for them."

The evening was marked by a sense of camaraderie, as Sinclair noted.

"It's an honour to welcome everyone to a family event," Sinclair said. "I feel like everyone here knows each other," he said to laughter from the audience.

Relationship with China flourishes

First in a series

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BEIJING — Israel's bilateral relationship with China, the world's most populous nation and an emerging superpower, has blossomed since the establishment of formal diplomatic relations in 1992.

But the eruption of the second Palestinian intifadah and Israel's cancellation of a major arms deal with China seems to have dented Israel's burgeoning ties with the Chinese.

Compared to a generation ago, when China considered Israel an illegitimate pariah state and a western lackey and cultivated ties with Arab states and the Palestinians, Israel's relations with China are now on a solid footing.

Before the 1980s, Chinese foreign policy was driven by Marxist-Leninist rhetoric, and China was so hostile to Israel that it supported its destruction.

But in the late 1970s, after Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping introduced sweeping reforms to its economy and launched a massive modernization program, China gradually adopted a more pragmatic attitude to Israel.

In the early 1980s, Israel reportedly formed quiet but lucrative defence ties with Beijing as China sought to upgrade its armed forces, particularly its tank corps.

There was a further thaw when China subsequently granted Israeli tourists visas and then allowed the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities – the precursor of an embassy – to open a permanent office at Beijing's World Trade Center.

以色列 和 中国.

Israel and China as rendered in Mandarin script

After the 1991 Madrid peace conference, China, albeit belatedly, recognized Israel. Shaul Eisenberg, an influential Israeli businessman with interests in China, was partly instrumental in facilitating these breakthroughs.

Beijing thought official relations with Israel would be useful. It viewed Israel as a source of, if not an avenue to, modern military technology. It believed a Chinese embassy in Tel Aviv would help it improve its bonds with the United States. And in keeping with its desire to be a major player on the international stage, it wanted a role in the effort to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The News in Brief

CANADA

BB Hires Ex-MPP

TORONTO — Former Thornhill MPP Tina Molinari has joined B'nai Brith Canada as president of its fundraising arm, the B'nai Brith Foundation, the organization announced last week. Molinari, who was defeated in last month's Ontario election, was a strong backer of the Equity in Education Tax Credit. Liberal Premier Dalton McGuinty has vowed to repeal the credit, which gives tax relief to parents of children in private schools.

More Groups Banned

OTTAWA — Canada has banned three more Palestinian terrorist groups. The federal government last week outlawed the Palestine Liberation Front, the PFLP-General Command and the Marxist-Leninist Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. The new additions bring to 34 the number of organizations banned under Canada's Anti-Terrorism Act. The move prohibits fundraising in Canada for the groups and requires financial institutions to freeze their assets. It also outlaws belonging to or having contact with the groups.

ISRAEL

Film Ban Overturned

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court overturned a ban on a documentary-style film accusing the Israeli army of atrocities in a 2002 battle in Jenin. Jenin, Jenin, directed by Israeli Arab actor Mohammed Bakri, was banned by Israel's Film Ratings Board after complaints by families of soldiers killed in the West Bank refugee camp in April 2002. The court agreed with Bakri's appeal that the ban violated free speech legislation. A UN probe determined that no massacre took place in Jenin and found no evidence that would support the charges in Bakri's film.

Canadian Lays Wreath

JERUSALEM — Donald Sinclair, Canada's new ambassador to Israel, laid a wreath in Yad Vashem's Hall of Remembrance last week to mark Remembrance Day and his first official visit to the Holocaust memorial.

Rival for Suez Canal?

TEL AVIV — Israel will build a railroad linking Ashdod and Eilat that could compete with the Suez Canal, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week. Speaking at an investment conference, he said the railroad would allow Israel to transfer goods from Eilat, its southern port, to Europe.

Law Blocked

TEL AVIV — Israel's highest court last week ordered the government to explain why it changed a law which gave automatic citizenship to Palestinians who marry Israelis. The court also temporarily blocked the state from deporting Palestinian spouses of three Israeli citizens. The decisions came in response to a petition from Arab and Meretz Party MKs and civil rights groups.

WORLD

Gas Maker Bankrupt

BERLIN — The company that produced the gas used at Nazi death camps has filed for bankruptcy. In World War II, an IG Farben subsidiary produced Zyklon B gas, which was used in Nazi gas chambers. The pre-World War II chemical company also built a plant on the outskirts of Auschwitz in Poland to produce artificial rubber and synthetic gasoline, mostly using slave labourers from Auschwitz.

Fights at Memorial

VIENNA — Clashes erupted at a ceremony here commemorating the 65th anniversary of Kristallnacht after protesters at the event waved Palestinian flags and yelled anti-Israel slogans. The ceremony marked the night of Nov. 9-10, 1938, when Nazi-inspired rioters set synagogues and Jewish stores ablaze in Germany and Austria.

Italians Cool on Israel

ROME — More than two-thirds of Italians believe Israel has a right to exist, though more than half have little sympathy for it, a new poll says. Some 22 per cent also say Jews aren't "real Italians" and 51 per cent said Jews have a different mentality than Italians.

Pro-Circumcision Study

SYDNEY — Male circumcision has major health benefits for both men and women, a new Australian study says. Circumcision protects men from HIV and lowers the chance of cervical cancer in their partners, researchers at Melbourne University said. After a report from the Royal Australasian College of Physicians that said there was little benefit but potential harm in circumcision, the rate fell to 10 per cent of males born in Australia.

Deadly Formula Not Available in Canada

TORONTO — An infant formula sold in Israel that has been linked to the deaths of two babies and damaged the central nervous systems of at least 13 others is not available in Canada's two main Jewish centres.

Spokespeople for the Sobey's and IGA grocery chains, the main carriers of kosher products in Toronto and Montreal respectively, say Remedia Super Soya 1 is not sold in their stores. A check of Toronto's smaller kosher food retailers and of the Kashrut Council revealed the same finding.

Israeli officials have launched a criminal investigation into the Remedia affair. Lab tests found the formula lacked vitamin B1, also known as thiamine, whose deficiency in infants can cause vomiting, diarrhea, seizures and loss of appetite. The resulting disorder of encephalopathy, or beriberi, can cause irreparable damage and death.

The product, which has been pulled off Israeli supermarket shelves, was sold mainly in haredi neighbourhoods because it bore an Orthodox Eida Charedi kosher certification.

The Jerusalem Post reported last week that a "small number" of Jewish infants in New York have been hospitalized with neurological symptoms after being fed the formula.

Also last week, Humana, the German company that manufactures the milk substitute, admitted it had accidently omitted vitamin B1 from the product. Prosecutors in Germany also confirmed reports that an employee of Humana is under investigation for manslaughter in relation to the affair.

Thousands of worried parents have called an emergency hotline set up by the baby food company and Israel's health ministry. Several lawsuits, including one class-action suit, have been filed in Israel against Remedia, which imports the formula. In the United States, H.J. Heinz, which owns 51 per cent of Remedia, has contacted leading Jewish groups about the matter.

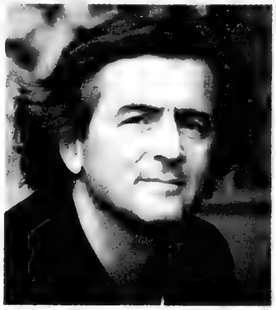
Daniel Pearl murdered for his secrets: author

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

American foreign correspondent Daniel Pearl was kidnapped and brutally murdered because he was a Jew, an American, and "knew too much."



Beranrd-Henri Levy

And the man who supposedly killed Pearl in January 2002, Ahmed Omar Sheikh, the British-born son of Pakistani immigrants, was an agent of Pakistan's military secret service, the Inter-Services Intelligence, known as I.S.I.

Bernard-Henri Levy, the author of a new international bestseller, Who Killed Daniel Pearl? (Melville House Publishing), made these comments in an interview last week during a brief visit to Toronto.

A 55-year-old prominent French intellectual and one of France's leading philosophers, he was also here to deliver a speech at Holy Blossom Temple.

Levy, whose book originally appeared in French, said he wrote it to pay tribute to "a great man, a great Jew" and an exemplar of tolerance and open-mindedness.

"The people who killed him hated everything he represented," said Levy, a tall, elegant man who visited Pakistan five times to gather material for Who Killed Daniel Pearl?

Levy said that Pearl, a Wall Street Journal reporter, jeopardized his life by venturing into the dark depths of Pakistan.

As he put it, "Pakistan is a country where to be a Jew, in certain circles, is not an identity or a religion, but a sin, a crime. Pearl was, in their eyes, such a criminal."

His murderer, a person who had been exposed to western values as a British citizen, was a rabid Islamic fundamentalist.

Sheikh murdered Pearl because he had established an incriminating link between I.S.I. and Al Qaeda, was closing in on the controller of convicted British "shoe bomber" Richard Reid and had discovered a connection between senior Pakistani nuclear scientists and Al Qaeda.

Suggesting that I.S.I. is a dangerous organization, Levy said it played a central role in the installation of a Taliban government in Afghanistan, and maintains close ties to Al Qaeda.

I.S.I. also channelled funds to Mohammed Atta, one of the Sept. 11 terrorist plotters.

Asked if I.S.I. operates independently of the Pakistani government, Levy said, "That's a good question."

Pakistan's president, Pervez Musharraf, is aware of I.S.I.'s relations with Al Qaeda, but lacks the authority to break that connection.

Nor does he have full control of Pakistan, Levy observed.

Certain shadowy figures in I.S.I. want to establish an Islamic fundamentalist state in Pakistan, and believe that Islam is on a collision course with the West.

They are strongly anti-American, as well as anti-Semitic, he noted.

"To them, Jews and Americans are identical. Islamic fundamentalism in Pakistan is strong and is blooming."

Levy called on the West to support the forces of democracy and moderation in Pakistan.

But he acknowledged he does not know how strong they are, or whether they can prevail.

According to Levy, Islam is currently embroiled in a historic internal dispute, pitting moderates against radicals.

He does not believe that Islam, per se, seeks a confrontation with the West.

"It's a battle between Islam and Islam, not Islam against the West," he said.

Poetry, prose and music

From the editor's desk

This week, I take a respite from commenting upon politics and politicians, and from bleak outlooks. Arts and culture occupy this column.

* * *

The first book-length collection of poetry in English by acclaimed Israeli writer, dramatist and translator Meir Wieseltier has just been published by the University of California Press. It is called The Flower of Anarchy and it is a small, shining gem.

The 62-year old Wieseltier is regarded by many observers to be the master of Israeli poetry. He has published 12 collections of poetry in Hebrew and has translated the works of Shakespeare, Virginia Woolf, Charles Dickens and E.M. Forster. He has received a number of awards, including the Prime Minister's Prize for Literature, the Bialik Prize and Israel's most prestigious award, the Israel Prize, in 2000.

Wieseltier's style is very distinctive: earthy and piquant, biting and brusque, and at times, tender and poignant.

He is no sentimentalist. His work glosses over none of the searing emotional pain that has accompanied 55 years of unceasing war.

"Two helicopters kissed midair./ Out of that kiss fell seventy-three corpses" begins On The Seventy-Three, a deeply felt, angry response to the tragic helicopter accident in the northern Galilee in 1997 in which 73 soldiers met their deaths.

But Wieseltier's anthology is by no means a political one. Indeed, it covers a melange of different subjects, from his earlier days in the '60s to the present. Nevertheless, as translator Shirley Kaufman – a gifted poet in her own right – points out, "love is a well-explored theme" throughout the slim collection of 150 pages and some 80 poems.

Kaufman's introduction to the book is itself an exceptional contribution. She helps to burnish our understanding of the poet, his poetry and the unique challenge of translating Hebrew.

"In Hebrew, [Wieseltier] is a master of word games, extended metaphor, alliteration, onomatopoeia and rhyme, often juxtaposing biblical archaic Hebrew with the colloquial. Every translator of Hebrew poetry faces the impossible task of transferring the freshness, the emotional precision, the poetic skill, the layering of meaning in the Hebrew words and the three root letters that make up the words, into another language – into poetry, with the original passion and meaning."

The Flower of Anarchy rings with lasting poignancy. For the scholar and lay reader alike, it is a worthwhile read.

A continent away, in New Jersey, the colourful American author, Curt Leviant, has just published two novellas: Ladies and Gentlemen, the Original Music of the Hebrew Alphabet and Weekend in Mustara (The University of Wisconsin Press).

Leviant, too, is an award-winning author and the recipient of several national and international literary fellowships for his work.

The two novellas are rich in imagination. As in Leviant's five previous novels, the signature trademark is boldness and humour.

His storylines are daring excursions into Jewish history and cultural folkways. They are also lessons in the wanderings and the travails of the Jewish people. There is nothing predictable that he fleshes out from his love of the Hebrew language and his understanding of the fragility of the human psyche.

Music of the Hebrew Alphabet tells of the encounter between a musicologist and a survivor who claims to be in possession of one of the ancient secrets of the Jewish people. Mustara also tells the tale of an academic who stumbles upon a historic and cultural treasure of the Jewish people.

The stories move very briskly. At their conclusion, the reader is happy to have travelled with the author.

* * *

Seldom, if ever, have I heard at the decorum-conscious performances of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra an audience stand up, cheer, hoot, shout and whistle their appreciation and delight for a performance and a performer.

Yet two weeks ago, after the 34-year-old Moscow-born pianist Boris Berezovsky completed the final movement of Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D Minor, Op. 30, led by guest conductor Thomas Dausgaard, the audience would not let him go.

Shouts of "bravo" and "more" echoed throughout the newly wood-panelled chamber for more than 10 minutes after the tall pianist had completed his brilliantly interpretation of this very demanding work.

Berezovsky is held in very high regard around the world and considered by critics and musicians alike to be one of the finest pianists in the world, with a reputation as a musician of insight and sensitivity.

In 1988, the London Times described him as "an artist of exceptional promise, a player of dazzling virtuosity and formidable power." In 1990, he won the Gold Medal at the 1990 International Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow.

Since then, his skills have grown. The full house at Roy Thomson Hall last week were very appreciative beneficiaries of those skills. —MBD

Olmert paints optimistic picture of Israeli economy

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel's tourism industry has taken a major hit in recent years, but the dropoff in this sector does not in itself account for the country's recession, says Ehud Olmert, Israel's Minister of Industry, Trade, Employment and Communications.

Ehud Olmert

Israel's economic recession "has relatively little to do with the political situation," Olmert said, referring to the Palestinian intifadah that has prompted thousands of visitors to cancel their trips since it began in 2000.

Olmert, who served for seven years as mayor of Jerusalem, was speaking at a VIP briefing in the Toronto law offices of Heenan Blaikie. His lunchtime address was sponsored by the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada and State of Israel Bonds.

While the drop in tourism "creates a feeling of despair" among Israelis, the real reason for the country's economic slowdown is the bursting of the high-tech bubble, he said.

"The crisis in high tech has nothing to do with the intifadah. It collapsed in North America and elsewhere," Olmert said.

A dynamic speaker with a commanding presence, Olmert painted an optimistic picture of Israeli economic prospects. "Israel exports high-tech products of greater than $16 billion (US) and I expect that in the next seven years, Israel's total exports of goods and services will go to the level of $36 billion per year," he said.

"It is possible. It is within the range of our reach and reflects the scope of our high-tech infrastructure that is not matched anywhere in the world except the United States."

Illustrating his analysis, Olmert pointed to a takeover during the high-tech boom of an Israeli startup (Chromatis Networks, a fibre-optic company) by the American giant, Lucent. Lucent paid between $5 billion and $6 billion for the startup, even though it was not yet in production. That single amount is greater than the entire Israeli tourism industry, he said.

High tech, Olmert said, plays a greater role in Israel than it does in other western economies.

"This is where we have a relative advantage. We can compete with the whole world," he said.

The high-tech industry is beginning to experience a turnaround "and we feel it in the State of Israel."

"[T]here is unlimited opportunity for high-tech investment… We're trying to improve the business environment to revive it to full-scale activity like it was" before the intifadah, he said.

The government is encouraging direct overseas investment in Israel and it is promoting exports through creation of special funds. Israel has improved its climate for business by improving its research and development policies and by changing its tax laws to encourage investment, he said.

In fact, Olmert said, the entire structure of the Israeli economy is changing. Israel has shed its socialist economic roots and is moving rapidly to become a free market economy. Part of that includes the privatization of such government-held icons as El Al Israel Airlines and the country's ports.

Bezeq, the country's telecom provider, will be privatized and licenses are being granted to cable companies to provide telephone service to compete with Bezeq.

"Israel in these areas is moving forward rapidly no less than America or Canada and other countries of the world," he said.

Israel is also investing heavily in upgrading the country's infrastructure, laying down a new highway that will span the country and will have a major impact on citizens' quality of life. The highway will permit residents of Jerusalem to drive to Carmel in 70 minutes, he said.

"Fast track" rail services are planned for the Jerusalem to Tel Aviv corridor as well as to Beersheva and Eilat.

The 20 billion shekel investment ($5.8 billion) "opens up a lot of opportunity for the private sector to get into Israel," he added.

Turning to the political situation, Olmert said the government remains open to diplomatic progress with the Palestinians, but he predicted little can be accomplished with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat in control. Arafat commands no trust, is unreliable, and lacks integrity and judgement, he said.

Holocaust Education Week

Veterans, survivors remember as program ends

BY ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Stirring speeches, emotional music and a candlelighting memorial captured the message of remembering the past to make a better future, at a Remembrance Day ceremony held at Adath Israel Congregation last week.

Veterans bedecked with poppies and army berets, and Holocaust survivors with their respective children and grandchildren, were among the hundreds of people who attended the ceremony, bringing the 23rd annual Holocaust Education Week to a touching conclusion.

Adath Israel's Rabbi Steven Saltzman, MP Irwin Cotler and the highest-ranking Jewish officer in the Canadian Forces, Maj.-Gen. Edward Fitch, gave passionate speeches.

"To find meaning in what happened," Rabbi Saltzman said of the Holocaust, "we must live with hope."

While Rabbi Saltzman explained the importance of remembering the past, he focused on the need to build on that memory in order to move forward.

"If you dwell on the memory of what it was like in Egypt, then you become warped," he said.

"Let's focus on the exodus."

In between the speeches, veterans marched to the tune of bagpipes, and the Adath Israel Professional Choir led by Cantor A. Eliezer Kirshblum, sang several songs including Av Harachamim and Mizmor L'David.

Six memorial candles were lit to pay tribute to those who perished in the Shoah and to Canadian Forces who lost their lives in war and peacekeeping missions.

Fitch, a recipient of the Golden Jubilee Medal, and the Meritorious Service Medal for his service in the former Yugoslavia, lauded the military contributions Canadian Jews made during World War II.

He noted 17,000 Jews joined the forces, fully 10 per cent of the entire Jewish population of Canada at the time.

"This was the highest percentage of any community," Fitch said, adding that his father was among the troops who participated in the liberation of Belgium in 1944.

Fitch emphasized Canada's crucial role in the current war on terrorism and in peacekeeping operations across the globe.

"You need to know that we are… fighting tyranny and terror," he said.

"We are in a constant battle for peace, harmony and mutual respect."

Familiar with the dangers of peacekeeping from having served in the Balkans, Fitch spoke about the challenges Canadian troops face overseas.

"There's a very fine line between war and peace operations," he said, adding that Canada's army is at times hamstrung by equipment shortages and challenged by a dependence on volunteers.

But Fitch said operations in Afghanistan and elsewhere has sparked a greater appreciation for remembrance.

"I sense there has been a resurgence of remembrance in Canada," Fitch said.

He urged young people in particular to learn the lessons of war.

Montreal Mount Royal MP Cotler, a renowned human rights activist and law professor at McGill University, garnered a standing ovation with his stirring words promoting remembrance and condemning anti-Semitism and all forms of racism.

He praised his fellow MPs for unanimously voting in favour of making Yom Hashoah an official day for commemorating the Holocaust across Canada.

Speaking at length about anti-Semitism, Cotler warned the age-old scourge continues to rear its ugly head.

"We are witnessing… a new, lethal anti-Semitism, grounded in Zionism is racism," Cotler said.

"The new anti-Semitism is the denial of the rights of the Jewish people (to live) as equal members of the family of nations."

He also discussed the disproportionate number of indictments against Israel at the United Nations, such as at the annual meeting of the UN Human Right Commission where five indictments were made against Israel, the most levelled against any country.

While some are dismissive of the perpetual UN bias, Cotler noted its importance.

"The UN does matter," Cotler said. "It's held as an idiom for Canadian foreign policy."

Moreover, negatively targeting Israel jeopardizes, "the credibility of the UN, for "anti-Semitism is an assault on the human dignity of all persons…While it may begin with Jews, it doesn't end with Jews."

Cotler concluded by calling on Jews and all Canadians to act against intolerance.

"The time has come… to come together to stand up and be counted against racism and hatred," Cotler said.

"What we need now is a culture of human rights, in place of a culture of hate."

Families maintain lawsuit for autism funding

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Despite a pledge by Dalton McGuinty during the election campaign that his Ontario Liberals would support funding treatment for children with autism beyond age six, 29 families found themselves back in court last week to force the province to do so.

The trial began April 28 in Superior Court as part of a lawsuit seeking what the families say is essential medical treatment and educational services for their children. They had hoped to force the former Tory government to provide a special program for children with autism as they progress through the school system. The case was adjourned over the summer.

In a Sept. 17 letter sent to Nancy Morrison, a parent of a child with autism, McGuinty, then leader of the opposition, said, "I also believe that the lack of government-funded IBI [intensive behavioural intervention] treatment for autistic children over six is unfair and discriminatory."

McGuinty promised that "in government, my team and I will work with clinical directors, parents, teachers and school boards to devise a feasible way in which autistic children in our province can get the support and treatment that they need. That includes children over the age of six."

Last week, the families resumed their case in Superior Court and Morrison said she is still waiting for the new minister of children's services, Marie Bountrogianni, to return her calls.

McGuinty's office referred inquiries about the case to Bountrogianni's office.

Peter Taylor, a spokesperson for the Ministry of Children's Services, said the minister is still being briefed on the issue.

Taylor said the government is committed to looking at what might help children with autism transition to school after they turn six. However, he would not comment on the current court case.

Eventually, the parents are hoping that IBI (also known as applied behavioural analysis, or ABA) will be available for all children with autism through the publicly funded school system. The parents are also arguing that the program now available to children five and under is inadequate and fails to provide any assistance to the many autistic children on long waiting lists.

McGuinty's letter states that currently "there are only about 500 children in the province receiving government-funded IBI treatment. It is alarming and unacceptable that there are almost twice as many on a waiting list."

Morrison's son will be five on Nov. 24 and has been on the list for two years.

"He may be aged out before he ever gets any publicly funded help," Morrison said. In the meantime, she has been paying almost $30,000 a year for a private provider at home.

"It's killing us," she said.

In April, Ontario Supreme Court Justice Arthur Gans issued an injunction requiring the Ministry of Community, Family and Children's Services to continue funding IBI treatment until the case is decided in Superior Court.

(In a separate, similar action filed earlier this year with the Ontario Human Rights Commission, some 100 families are seeking to end what they call discrimination against their children.)

Autism is a neurological disorder that typically affects a person's ability to communicate, form relationships with others and respond appropriately to their environment.

IBI is an intensive program that helps children learn to modify certain behaviours through the use of rewards. Since autism affects certain areas of the brain, therapists, consultants, parents and educators work one-on-one with the children so children can learn to utilize other parts of their brain to master small skills a little bit at a time. With IBI, children with mild cases of the disorder can learn to become highly functional.

McGuinty promised to support funding for treatment

Therapy can cost up to $50,000 per year. There are an estimated 3,000 children under the age of six in Ontario with autism, making the estimated cost to the province $150 million.

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, spiritual leader of Beth Sholom Synagogue, whose daughter with autism just turned six, said that until now "the province has done a half-measured job dealing with the issue."

The problem has been passed back and forth between social services and health care and "very quickly lands in the twilight zone of indifference," Rabbi Flanzraich said.

In the meantime, he added, "it has developed into a profound humanitarian crisis."

One of the parents involved in the Superior Court lawsuit, Tammy Starr, took her daughter out of Zareinu Educational Centre because when she was younger there was no IBI program at the school. (Zareinu has since started a program.)

Starr's daughter, Carly, goes to public school during the day, where she has an IBI-trained teacher's assistant who has received 100 hours of training at the family's expense. Carly also receives IBI training at home.

Starr said she wonders why the province and the families are in adversarial positions in court at huge expense to everyone when McGuinty agrees the current situation is discriminatory.

"That's exactly what we're claiming," Starr said. "It doesn't make sense."

The monster has risen

On Friday, the headline on the page 1 story of Ha'aretz, read: "There is a fear that Islamic anti-Semitism is evolving into terror against Jews." Alas, the author of the story, Amiram Barkat, was more prophetic than he had wanted to be.

On Saturday, two synagogues in Istanbul, Turkey, were bombed. At least 23 people were killed and more than 300 wounded. Grotesque carnage was the result. As of this writing, it is not certain who the murderers were. A shadowy group that calls itself the Great Eastern Islamic Raiders Front first claimed "credit" for the attack. But most experts believe the attack was too sophisticated in its planning and in its execution to have been the work of a small band of thuggish terrorists. The method of the murders bore the characteristic signature markings of a much larger group, and the list of possibilities is quite familiar to us all.

Over the weekend, in a separate act of terror, a Jewish school outside of Paris was set ablaze. Thankfully, no one was injured. French authorities attributed that particular act of terrorism to racists and anti-Semites.

These two violent expressions of anti-Semitism are but the ugly offspring of the more casual, non-violent expressions of anti-Semitism that have emanated from Europe recently. As Barkat pointed out in his article, the incidence of anti-Semitism in the past month in Europe has been unprecedented. Among a number of examples, Barkat cited the attitudes towards Jews disclosed in the recently released European Union opinion poll and the vulgar statement by renowned conductor-composer Mikis Theodorakis that the Jews are "the source of evil."

Israel's minister for Diaspora affairs, Natan Sharansky, hosted a forum last week for Foreign Ministry and Jewish Agency colleagues on the very worrisome phenomenon, especially in Europe, of the surging scourge of anti-Semitism. Sharansky defined the monster that has risen anew in Europe as having three heads: classical, new and Islamic anti-Semitism.

The musings of Theodorakis, Sharansky said, fell into the first category. The excessive, disproportionate, one-sided criticisms of the government of Israel, he suggested, fell into the new category. The finding that 59 per cent of Europeans believed Israel was a threat to world peace was a symptom of the new anti-Semitism.

Having incessantly been fed only negative, hateful images of Israel, the Europeans are disgorging the result. The most immediately dangerous form of anti-Semitism, Sharansky warned, is its Islamic iteration, because it targets all Jews, wherever they are. It does not distinguish between its campaign against the State of Israel and the Jews of the world.

The craven, bloody acts in Istanbul are but the latest proof, although German authorities recently foiled attempted attacks by cells of Islamic terrorists against Jewish institutions in Berlin and Dusseldorf.

Without a doubt, the government of Israel and international Jewish bodies have important roles to play in the struggle against worldwide anti-Semitism. But the monster is indiscriminant. Hatred and the terrorism that feeds on it are that way. It will harm, and has already harmed, entire societies. The struggle, therefore, is that of the entire civilized world.

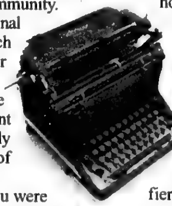
Question was outrageous

In his Rabbinic Reflections column ("Could we follow the example of Abraham?" CJN, Nov. 6), Rabbi Aaron Mitnick poses a question he calls "uncomfortable": Could we follow Abraham's example – namely, would we be among the majority of Palestinians who support suicide bombings if we had been brought up as Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza?

The question is not uncomfortable. It's outrageous.

Suicide bombings perpetrated against Israelis are criminal acts of murder. They are pre-meditated, illegitimate, designed to kill and maim without regard to the identity, nationality, position of or consequence to the victim or the community. To suggest that we would support such horrific criminal activity if we were Palestinians sounds pretty much like rendering the criminal act "understandable," or worse, "acceptable" or "legitimate" in context.



I do not impute anything to your columnist more than an unfortunate turn of phrasing. Yet you did print his column, and what it says to those who are rightly sensitive is that we would support the same type of conduct.

Perhaps Rabbi Mitnick is simply saying, if you were raised as a mafioso or a Nazi, wouldn't you also support criminal or anti-Jewish activity? In that case, he isn't saying anything.

If he is suggesting suicide bombings are understandable because "we would be no better," I think we have a big problem. The problem is the Jewish community is becoming used to terrorism and buying the Arab and European sentiment that we asked for it.

The individual Jew does not have to rise to the level of Abraham to know a crime when he or she sees it. A person with the least bit of moral fibre would not only back away from even thinking about supporting such activity, but would "lech lecha," or quickly take leave, as the parshah advises. The sad and dangerous fact that the Palestinian majority supports suicide bombing should stimulate a more salient question: how do you deal with neighbours who think it is perfectly acceptable to blow up you and your house?

Prime minister failed

Much has happened since the creation of the State of Israel in May 1948, but anti-Semitism still reigns supreme in Arab countries and elsewhere.

Arab leaders are so preoccupied with their own domestic situations that they always attempt to distract attention from their policies by blaming, defaming and inventing false allegations against the Jews. A large number of Muslim leaders also continue to make cruel and lethal diatribes against the Jews.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien felt it was inappropriate to rebuke the Jew-baiting former Malaysian prime minister Mahathir Mohamad. It was left instead to the officials of Canada's Minister of Foreign Affairs Bill Graham to call the Malaysian High Commissioner to Canada and register a formal protest.

Survivors not alone anymore

If silence could talk, the mysteries of many lives would awaken to tell their stories, sometimes to frighten, sometimes to impress, sometimes to fascinate. When the sun goes down in fiery red, it is like a land after a battle. Thousands fought, few returned. Millions left, a small number returned. Homes were destroyed, lands parched and people killed. Stones and bricks. Stay or go, rebuild or leave. A little bent-over women sits on a stone, her hair shaved, dressed in a grey striped dress, her eyes red, tears cannot come anymore. Where to go? No home, no family no children. Were are the children? God says, "We sinned." The children, too? Where to go now? I paid for sins that were never mine.

Stones and bricks, the remnants of life.

What is your name? A voice is heard. Are you talking to me, my God? Yes, I am talking to you, but I am not God. I am, as you, alone. Come let's go together. There is a demolished house. One wall is still standing. We can sleep there tonight. Look the sun is coming down. Look, it is fiery red. But it is going down. That fire will not hurt you. Come, we will lean on the broken wall and we will think of tomorrow. We will lie down and warm our broken bodies. Maybe it's God's will. Sixty years have passed. We are not together anymore. I am again alone, remembering. The children have grown up, have lovely families. They are good children. Somebody is at the door. Hello mother how are you today?

Look ma, the children are here. They love to see you. I am not alone.

Lauds Canada's position

I welcomed Canada's vote on the mid-October UN resolution that called on Israel to dismantle its security fence, both as a Canadian and as a Jew ("Canada condemns Israel's security fence," CJN, Oct. 30).

As your story noted, Canada and countries in the European Union ensured the resolution included condemnation of other recent horrific suicide bombings and terrorist attacks. The security fence causes severe hardship – a different form of terror – to Palestinian villagers by seizing substantial amounts of Palestinian land, dividing people from their fields and even separating villages from their schools. These are undeniable facts, as are the bombings.

If it were being built on Israel's recognized border, Canada's UN ambassador would not have said, "Canada considers the expropriation of land to facilitate the construction of this barrier to be unacceptable."

In response, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) repeated its empty mantra: "Israel was compelled to build the barrier in response to terrorism." But the CIC does not respond to all the facts, because it knows it cannot justify Israel's behaviour.

I applaud Canada's position on such unjustifiable actions, as well as its condemnation of terrorist attacks.

Claims Conference is on trial

By ELI PFEFFERKORN

As the deteriorating medical and financial situation of aging Holocaust survivors has made its way to both the Jewish and general press, leading Jewish institutions have finally come to recognize the predicament of the survivor community.

The group responsible for alerting the press and the Jewish leadership to this crisis is the Holocaust Survivors' Foundation (HSF), an umbrella organization comprised of 35 local organizations across the United States. HSF activists have relentlessly taken the survivors' case before the officials responsible for distributing Swiss bank monies and unclaimed insurance monies. But the thrust of their protest has been against the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany (known as the Claims Conference). They have been in contact with Claims Conference officials over a long period of time in their attempts to improve the conditions of ailing and poverty-stricken survivors. Alas, so far they have met with little success.

The Claims Conference has created a formula that allocates 80 per cent of restitution monies for survivors' welfare and the remaining 20 per cent for education and research. This is a diversionary tactic intended to frame the dispute between the Claims Conference and the HSF, demonstrating the former's supposed historical responsibility and the survivors' shortsightedness, notwithstanding the fact that it was the survivors who first initiated the education campaign.

But the heart of the dispute is not the 80-20 division. It is that great sums of money are funnelled into non-Holocaust enterprises, both in education and welfare, while some survivors live in poverty.

I met the HSF activists for the first time in New York on July 6. Weatherworn faces, the endurance of their experience lodged deeply in their eyes, they gathered to bear witness, this time not to their agonizing experiences, but to the suffering of their fellow survivors. Now in their mid-70s and early 80s, retired and financially secure, they have dedicated their lives to righting an awful wrong.

Responding to their call, the United Jewish Communities, an umbrella organization for the Jewish Federation, appointed an ad hoc Holocaust Survivor Service Committee that met July 7 to air the dispute between the activists and the Claims Conference. I was invited to represent Muted Voices United, a recently formed group of university students and graduates in Canada.

The HSF representatives described the lamentable situation of their fellow survivors. Bed-ridden and wheelchair-bound elderly men and women receive insufficient nursing hours; even those still up and about need help with shopping and household chores. A significant number of survivors, who are in reasonably good health, are still managing, but they're anxious about what might happen to them when their health begins to fail.

Gideon Taylor, the conference's executive vice-president, assured me that "the anxiety of survivors regarding their future is what drives the work of the Claims Conference." Rabbi Israel Singer, the conference's president, professed to share Taylor's concern for the survivors whose welfare preoccupies his time. But the sad pictures described by the survivors suggest otherwise.

Admittedly, there is no malice or invidiousness involved in the Claims Conference's policy allocations. But then why is it that good intentions yield so much misery and anguish? Why is there such a wide gap between intention and fulfilment?

The answer to this question lies in the philosophy that underlies the conference's activities: the sanctioning of individual sacrifice on the altar of historical necessity, or, the sacrifice of individual welfare for the sake of the greater good of the nation. Resting on the assertion that the entire Jewish people were the targets of the Final Solution, the Claims Conference deduces that klal Yisrael, the entire Jewish people, are the inheritors of restitution monies.

Instructed by historical responsibility, Rabbi Singer is calling for the establishment of a Jewish fund whose purpose "would be to create a new future for the Jewish people. This restitution should be used to rebuild the Jewish soul and spirit," presumably destroyed by the Holocaust.

In this klal Yisrael calculus, the significance of the survivor factors in marginally. Meanwhile, as Ruth Sinai reports in Ha'aretz (May 6), incontinent survivors in Israel cannot afford diapers.

The Claims Conference's allocation policy fits into Singer's view of history by which, in its Holocaust manifestation, the survivor becomes an abstraction, despite Singer's rhetoric to the contrary.

David Schaechter, HSF's president, charges that "large amounts of funds recovered in the name of Holocaust victims are not necessarily used for survivor needs. They have become a source of 'world-wide Jewish philanthropy,'" obviously serving Singer's grandiose vision of the Jewish future. Sufficient circumstantial documentation exists to prove Schaechter's charges.

At the close of the July 7 meeting, Mark Talisman, an advocate for the survivors, suggested that the dispute between the survivors and the Claims Conference touches the entire Jewish community. Indeed, the humaneness of Jewish institutions is being put on trial and how they react to this wrong will be a test of their moral being.

Conference aids survivors, preserves Shoah legacy

By SAM E. BLOCH

I am a survivor of the Holocaust. I and my fellow survivors are the witnesses who emerged from Nazi hell with a special message and a sacred legacy of remembrance and justified claims of restitution.

It is crucially important that Holocaust restitution funds and other resources within the Jewish community are used to assist my fellow survivors who need social services they cannot afford. These are brave men and women who are elderly now and need homecare, medical care, financial aid and other assistance. They may not be able to meet the costs of these services. The scars left by the past affects their health and their entire existence. Funds from Holocaust restitution and from Jewish organizations must be used to help them live out their days in a measure of dignity.

The plight of needy survivors has only recently come to the attention of the wider Jewish community, but the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (known as the Claims Conference) has played a pivotal role for a decade in providing assistance to them. Its funds for this assistance derive primarily from its recovery of unclaimed Jewish property in the former East Germany.

The Claims Conference fought to recover this property at the same time as it safeguarded the right of heirs to stolen Jewish property to file claims for it. If the organization had not fought to recover this property, it would have reverted back to the state or to postwar non-Jewish owners – a simply unthinkable outcome.

The Claims Conference has used most of the sale proceeds from, or compensation for, that property to fund specialized care for Holocaust survivors in more than 30 countries. The needs are great and diverse and assistance includes homecare, medical care and equipment, hot meals, winter clothing, rent payments, nursing beds and emergency cash grants.

The needs of many Holocaust survivors, who have endured so much hardship in their lives, should be of permanent concern to the entire Jewish community and to all Jewish federations, not only to the Claims Conference.

But the Claims Conference has come under criticism of late for its allocations that support Shoah education, research and documentation. Faced with the imperatives of caring for elderly survivors and ensuring that the lessons of the Shoah are preserved for generations to come, the Claims Conference has done both. It has used a small portion of the funds from the recovery of German Jewish property to fulfil an obligation to preserve the memory of those who perished.

These grants for education and documentation projects amount to 20 per cent of Claims Conference allocations, which makes up only one to two per cent of the entire Claims Conference budget. The vast majority of that budget is composed of direct compensation payments to survivors.

It is not enough to repeatedly sound the slogan "Remember." When we sound this command, it should be directed primarily to the world around us, to those who were not in Treblinka. And this is where grants for education, research and documentation are vitally important. Restitution funds must also be used for this purpose.

Claims Conference allocations in this area are also used for Shoah educational programs and teaching materials, as well as efforts to document, archive and preserve irreplaceable documents, pictures, artifacts and first-hand survivor accounts of the Holocaust.

These funds come from the assets of those who perished. Using a small portion to preserve their memory is fully justified. And it is gratifying. These efforts must be continued so that the legacy of the Holocaust remains with the world long after the survivors are gone. This summer, the Claims Conference's board of directors – which includes many survivors – voted unanimously to retain the current distribution of funds.

It is my firm belief that any survivor who needs social service assistance should receive it. Those who emerged from the camps, ghettos, forests and hiding places have already endured more than any human being should. In their last years, they are entitled to care and comfort, and it is the responsibility of the Jewish community to supplement the efforts already being made in this area with restitution funds.

But restitution funds have many worthy uses, among them ensuring that the names of the six million are recorded for all time. Those who perished wished to be remembered. We must honour their last wish.

Walking up the down escalator

I hear these stories while standing at the bar at simchahs, sharing a l'chaim with the grandparents of the bride or groom or bar or bat mitzvah. As these proud grandparents are chatting and smiling, I'll notice that they have an unusual glint in their eye, a look of pure glee mixed with pure defiance. And they'll whisper to me: "You know I shouldn't be alive… they should have got me, but what happened was…" They then proceed to tell me their stories of how a remarkable convergence of persistence and luck allowed them to survive, rebuild and celebrate simchahs.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Nowadays, the generation of Holocaust survivors is once again battling the angel of death, and I often hear these stories while preparing a eulogy. Each time a survivor dies, I am reminded that without them, the Jewish world would be smaller, weaker and duller. Their families, their communal involvements and the fact they are a living link to eastern European Judaism have all contributed immeasurably to reconstructing the Jewish world after the Holocaust.

But to me, the survivors teach more than history. They teach character. Many survived due to incredible, impossible adventures. In each of these adventures, the survivor's character is critical. They did the impossible because they had chutzpah, tenacity and optimism. Their stories have taught me the importance of determination, a lesson that's significant for anyone who has ever faced failure and disappointment.

It's easy to give up. Our society's wonderful overabundance of comforts comes with an unfortunate side effect: it has made people soft. We've become so used to success that we are unable to cope with adversity. Personal, relationship and business difficulties often end with people giving up, because we are easily discouraged.

For survivors, quitting wasn't an option.

I remember a survivor telling me, "You know, I just wanted to live." It may seem like a pointless comment, since everyone wants to live. But when a survivor makes this remark, it speaks volumes about personal determination. This man refused to give up in the face of overwhelming odds. Many others simply surrendered. Some even walked into electrified fences in order to end their suffering. But survivors persevered, clinging to life even when it seemed absurd. To me, endless determination is their greatest legacy.

I once heard a speaker remark, "Life is like walking up the down escalator." Despite our wealth and success, this is true of all of us at one time or another. We all have disappointments that pull us down. The survivors climbed up an impossible escalator, and somehow they made it to the top. Because of their accomplishments, they remain an inspiration to all of us struggling our way up the escalator of life.

Active versus passive leadership

Leaders have always wondered how active or passive they should be. The active leader risks exacerbating problems by tackling them; the passive leader risks being overwhelmed by problems that fester unchecked. Peace, order and good government are noble aspirations, but they should not dictate passivity in a treacherous world. Sometimes, the only way to achieve peace, order and any kind of reasonable government is to be proactive, even aggressive.

Gil Troy in Montreal

These days, Americans and Canadians can witness two clashing approaches to this dilemma. U.S. President George W. Bush has become a surprisingly activist president, especially in foreign policy, while Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's prolonged goodbye has only exaggerated his tendency to ignore problems or let them solve themselves.

Since Sept. 11, Bush has become the kind of engaged foreign policy leader he never dreamed he would be. A "compassionate conservative" committed to keeping government small and constrained, Bush used to mock former U.S. president Bill Clinton's hyperkinetic foreign policy. But Osama Bin Laden's mass murders transformed him. In embracing the notion of preemptive war, Bush has emerged as a bold, unconventional leader, for better or worse.

Iraq is proving to be treacherous ground for testing Bush's proactive strategy. The president chose to play a high- stakes game in addressing a challenge he could have ignored. If his approach is successful, it will resonate across the Middle East and intimidate terrorists. If he fails, it could be tremendously destabilizing.

Despite claims of victory from Republicans and of defeat from Democrats, the reconstruction of Iraq will take years, not months. Although polls show most Iraqis believe that eliminating Saddam Hussein improved their lives, news coverage suggests the invasion has stirred a hornet's nest. Caricaturing Bush as a heavy-handed ideologue who made a bad situation worse, critics who tend to minimize the former Iraqi dictator's firepower nevertheless claim that Saddam's fall disbursed dangerous weaponry throughout the world. They minimize the damage Saddam imposed on his own people, downgrade the risk he posed to world peace and have prematurely declared Bush's Iraq policy a failure. Had CNN or CBC scrutinized the reconstruction of Germany or Japan in the 1940s with such impatience, they would have pronounced those failures, too.

At the same time, with a deficit of half a trillion dollars looming at home, it is regrettable that Bush is not as aggressive and, dare we say it, progressive in tackling his domestic problems, while a little more caution and a lot more planning would have helped in Iraq.

By contrast, Chrétien has so retreated into his shell he lacks the gumption to address corruption at home or Islamic fascism and anti-Semitism abroad. Bush is supposedly captive to business interests, yet his Republican administration has remained relatively scandal free, while Chrétien's Liberal government has advanced new frontiers in feather-bedding and expense-account padding with nary a cross word from the boss. Last month, Chrétien could not even be bothered to condemn Malaysian Prime Minister Mahatir Mohamad's anti-Semitic rant. He followed diplomatic protocol rather than the call of conscience, proving once again that while he might be angling for a United Nations or international development job, inclusion in an updated version of Profiles in Courage is not in his future. While the Canadian prime minister – leading a nation that prides itself on multiculturalism – shook hands with the Malaysian bigot, Bush said wild conspiratorial charges about Jews dominating the world were "wrong and divisive," and such racism "stands squarely against what I believe in."

During his ultimately tragic presidential campaign, Robert Kennedy said, "If you're not part of the solution, you are part of the problem." Chrétien has followed a policy that suggests that if you choose not to be part of the solution, you should simply ignore the problem. Kennedy typically ended his 1968 speeches with the George Bernard Shaw comment, "Some people see things as they are and say, 'Why?' I see things that never were and say, 'Why not?'"

How ironic that Bush, the conservative, has embraced this activist liberal teaching in response to the threat of totalitarian terror and anti-Semitism. Historians looking back on this era will wonder how the consciences of Chrétien and many other self-styled liberals went AWOL and how their nerves failed them at this critical crossroads. Bush may stumble, but his moral vision ennobles his country and inspires his fellow citizens. By contrast, Chrétien's final lap as the incredible shrinking prime minister, a moral pygmy who hears no evil and sees no evil, diminishes his country and demeans his fellow citizens.

A democratic Middle East?

"Sixty years of Western nations excusing and accommodating the lack of freedom in the Middle East did nothing to make us safe." This sentence, spoken recently by George W. Bush, is about the most jaw-dropping repudiation of an established bipartisan policy ever made by a U.S. president.

Daniel Pipes in Washington, D.C.

Not only does it break with a policy the U.S. government has pursued since first becoming a major player in the Middle East, but the speech is audacious in its ambition, grounded in history, and programmatically specific. It's the sort of challenge to existing ways one expects to hear from a columnist, essayist, or scholar – not from the leader of a great power.

Bush spoke in a candid manner, as heads of state almost never do: "In many Middle Eastern countries, poverty is deep and it is spreading, women lack rights and are denied schooling. Whole societies remain stagnant while the world moves ahead… As long as the Middle East remains a place where freedom does not flourish, it will remain a place of stagnation, resentment, and violence ready for export."

This is not the first time Bush has dispatched decades' worth of policy toward a Middle East problem and declared a radically new approach. He also did so concerning Iraq and the Arab-Israeli conflict.

In Iraq, he brushed aside the long-standing policy of deterrence, replacing it in June 2002 with an approach of hitting before getting hit. U.S. security, he said, "will require all Americans to be forward-looking and resolute, to be ready for pre-emptive action when necessary to defend our liberty and to defend our lives." This new approach provided justification for the war against Saddam Hussein, removing the Iraqi dictator from power before he could attack.

In the Arab-Israeli conflict, I called Bush's overhaul of the U.S. approach to the Arab-Israeli conflict in June 2003 perhaps "the most surprising and daring step of his presidency." He changed presumptions by presenting a Palestinian state as the solution, imposing this vision on the parties, tying results to a specific timetable, and replacing leaders of whom he disapproved.

And now, on the subject of democracy in the Middle East, the president has renounced a long-accepted policy of "Middle East exceptionalism" – getting along with dictators – and stated that American policy would henceforth fit with the United States' global emphasis of making democracy the goal.

He brought this issue home by tying it to American security: "With the spread of weapons that can bring catastrophic harm to our country and to our friends, it would be reckless to accept the status quo." Then, on the premise that "the advance of freedom leads to peace," Bush announced "a forward strategy of freedom in the Middle East." Drawing explicit comparisons with the U.S. success in sponsoring democracy in Europe and Asia, he called on Americans once again for "persistence and energy and idealism" to do the same in the Middle East.

Understanding the rationale behind the old dictator-coddling policy makes clear the radicalism of this new approach. The old way noticed that the populations are usually more anti-American than are the emirs, kings, and presidents. Washington was rightly apprehensive that democracy would bring in more radicalized governments. This is what actually happened in Iran in 1979 and nearly happened in Algeria in 1992. It also worried that once the radicals reached power, they would close down the democratic process (what was dubbed "one man, one vote, one time").

Bush's confidence in democracy – that despite the "street's" history of extremism and conspiracy-mindedness, it can mature and become a force of moderation and stability – is about to be tested. This process did in fact occur in Iran. Will it recur elsewhere? The answer will take decades to find out.

However matters develop, this gamble is typical of a president exceptionally willing to take risks to shake up the status quo. And while one speech does not constitute a new foreign policy – which will require programmatic details, financial support, and consistent execution – the shift has to start somewhere. Presidential oratory is the appropriate place to start.

And if the past record of this president in the Middle East is anything by which to judge – toppling regimes in Afghanistan and Iraq, promoting a new solution to Arab-Israeli conflict – he will be true to his word here too. Get ready for an interesting ride.

Israel's alliance with the U.S. was formed by Kennedy

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

John Fitzgerald Kennedy, the young American president who was tragically gunned down in Dallas 40 years ago this week, is best known for the central role he played in the Cuban missile crisis and for his libidinous lifestyle. Yet few realize that Kennedy was the father of the United States' strategic alliance with Israel. JFK, as he was dubbed by the media, was the first U.S. president to break the arms embargo blocking the sale of major U.S. weaponry to Israel. It was a turning point in Israel's ties with America.

The Kennedy administration sold Israel Hawk anti-aircraft missile batteries, which opened the way for the sale of tanks, Skyhawk bombers and Phantom jets under the subsequent presidency of Lyndon Baines Johnson. These transactions, which angered the Arab world immensely, were not merely commercial deals, but a clear and unmistakable signal that a new era in Israel's pivotal relationship with the United States had begun.

Warren Bass, an American foreign policy specialist who was born in Canada, has written an illuminating book, Support Any Friend, about this intriguing topic. It is published by Oxford University Press.

In light of Kennedy's background as the son of an anti-Semitic Irish Catholic businessman and politician, it is ironic that Kennedy was the president who transformed the very nature of America's relations with Israel.

Kennedy, in his youth, wrote approvingly of British restrictions that barred Jewish refugees from Palestine. But after running successfully for Congress in 1946, he applauded president Harry Truman's decision to recognize Israel.

In 1951, he and his siblings, including brother Robert, travelled to the Middle East. One of the highlights of Kennedy's trip to Israel was a dinner with the prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, who firmly believed that Israel's interests dictated a strong friendship with the United States.

Kennedy, who described Israel as "a beacon of inspiration to all free men everywhere," was one of Israel's most unwavering friends in Congress. He backed a 1952 bill to help Israel absorb immigrants. Then, as a senator, he condemned Soviet anti-Semitism, opposed the Eisenhower administration's push for United Nations sanctions against Israel over the 1956 Suez war and urged John Foster Dulles, the secretary of state, to lift the U.S. embargo on arms sales to Israel.

After his election as president, Kennedy, a Democrat, met with Ben-Gurion, still the Israeli prime minister, in New York City. "You know I was elected by the Jews," he supposedly told Ben-Gurion. "I have to do something for them. I will do something for you."

Although his views on the Middle East were doubtless influenced by the imperatives of ethnic politics, Kennedy's Mideast policy transcended these crass considerations. The intersecting goals of his administration were to thwart the Soviet penetration of the region, to ensure the continued flow of oil to the West, to contain Arab-Israeli tensions, to prevent nuclear proliferation and to achieve a reasonable degree of rapport with the Arab states and Israel.

Kennedy was far more pro-Israeli than his immediate Republican predecessor, Dwight D. Eisenhower, whose relations with Israel had been somewhat chilly. Eisenhower, though personally sympathetic to Israel, was part of a foreign policy establishment that had argued that the emergence of a Jewish state could endanger oil supplies, drive the Arabs into the Soviet orbit and put at risk the lives of American soldiers in the Middle East.

In accordance with this philosophy, the United States, as well as France and Britain, supported the 1950 Tripartite Declaration, pledging not to arm Middle East aggressors and to uphold the 1948 Arab-Israeli armistice agreements.

The Eisenhower administration sold Israel recoilless anti-tank rifles for defensive purposes, but it categorically rejected Israel's further requests for heavy arms. Kennedy reversed this policy in 1962 by supplying Israel with Hawk missiles. Bass regards this sale as perhaps "the most underappreciated milestone in the U.S.-Israeli special relationship."

Eisenhower turned down Israel's request for Hawks in 1960 on the grounds that such a sale would spur a perilous regional arms race and undermine the United States' position in the Middle East.

Spurning this logic, Kennedy agreed to the Hawk sale to assuage Israeli fears over the flow of sophisticated Soviet military equipment to Egypt, as well as to dissuade Israel from acquiring a nuclear capability and to convince Israel to resolve the festering Palestinian refugee problem.

Dean Rusk, Kennedy's secretary of state, who had opposed the creation of Israel, said that a presidential decision to sell Israel Hawks was in America's interest. As he put it: "Greater confidence in its defences would permit Israel to better resist any temptation to engage in preemptive attack against [Egypt's] air strike capability."

Shimon Peres, then a senior official in Israel's defence ministry, concurred with this analysis. He told McGeorge Bundy, Kennedy's national security advisor, that the Hawks were "a necessary contribution to the stabilization of the Middle East."

Apart from this consideration, the Kennedy administration sought to wean Egypt – ruled by the charismatic Gamal Abdel Nasser – away from the Soviet Union, the United States' chief rival.

Kennedy courted Nasser assiduously, but his overture failed miserably. Nasser befriended Cuban leader Fidel Castro, Washington's arch enemy in Latin America, and sent troops to Yemen, much to the consternation of Saudi Arabia, America's oil depot.

More than a decade would elapse before the United States and Egypt finally formed a rapprochement.

As a quid pro quo for the Hawks, Kennedy insisted on Israeli co-operation regarding a United Nations initiative on Palestinian refugees. The State Department, which was not as kindly disposed to Israel as Kennedy himself, theorized that progress on this file would, as Bass writes, "lance a political boil."

Ben-Gurion, who spoke grudgingly about taking in 100,000 refugees, blamed the Arabs for creating the issue in the first place.

In a letter to Kennedy, he added, "I must say that I can conceive of no practical plan which will bring about a settlement of the refugee problem in the near future as long as the Arab rulers are planning the destruction of Israel."

Kennedy's gesture toward the Palestinians was still-born, given the Arabs' call for the full repatriation of the refugees.

As Bass points out, the Cuban missile crisis reinforced Kennedy's interest in nuclear non-proliferation. But he was also concerned that Israel's efforts to join the nuclear club would drive the Arabs into the Soviet camp and destabilize the area.

John Fitzgerald Kennedy

Israel had taken possession of a small U.S. research reactor in 1958. Washington had no objection to Israel using nuclear power for energy, technological gain and water desalinization. But Israel's construction of a nuclear arsenal, with the assistance of France, crossed all red lines, in the opinion of the Kennedy administration.

Kennedy, therefore, requested inspections of Israel's Dimona plant, which Ben-Gurion had once disingenuously characterized as a textile factory.

In the face of Ben-Gurion's obduracy, Kennedy fired off a threatening letter, saying that his "government's commitment to and support of Israel could be seriously jeopardized if it should be thought that we were unable to obtain reliable information on a subject as vital to peace as the question of Israel's efforts in the nuclear field."

Before the issue could be resolved, Ben-Gurion resigned. His replacement, Levi Eshkol, was far less combative and acceded to Washington's demand. But, as Bass notes, "Eshkol made sure that those inspections never found Israel's best-hidden secrets."

U.S. scientists were taken on a cursory 40-minute inspection around Dimona. Dissatisfied with the tour, they complained that they had not been given "an opportunity to see all sides of the operation."

Rusk demanded a more comprehensive inspection regime. Eshkol, who never considered Dimona as important to Israel's long-term security as did Ben-Gurion, offered a compromise solution that both sides accepted.

Prior to Kennedy's assassination, Israel formally asked the United States for surface-to-surface missiles, tanks and naval vessels, all to counter the threat supposedly posed by Egypt. Kennedy was murdered before he was able to consider that request.

Johnson, his successor and one of the most pro-Israel of presidents, was forthcoming. In 1965, he allowed Israel to buy 210 M-48 tanks, and in 1966, he permitted Israel to purchase 48 Skyhawks. In 1968, when Israel was bogged down in the War of Attrition with Egypt, Johnson let Israel purchase 50 F-4 Phantom jets.

But it was Kennedy who basically altered the United States' relationship with Israel.

Yad Vashem society celebrates 50th anniversary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem marked the 50th anniversary of the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority in Jerusalem last week amid concerns of growing anti-Semitism.

At a gala jubilee dinner at the Sheraton Centre, one speaker after another decried this phenomenon.

Edward Sonshine, the society's campaign co-chair, said that anti-Semitic incidents are on the rise, and warned that anti-Semitism may become "acceptable."

Yad Vashem, he noted, has an important role to play in educating the public about the Holocaust and the divisive results of racial hatred.

The keynote speaker, Ehud Olmert, Israel's deputy prime minister and minister of industry and trade, declared that anti-Semitism has merged with an antipathy toward Israel.

He praised Yad Vashem as an exemplary organization that preserves the past, and said that Israel's existence guarantees that another holocaust will not happen.

Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada, said that strengthening Yad Vashem is "the answer" to the anti-Semitism of the kind propagated by the former prime minister of Malaysia, Mahathir Mohammed, who claimed last month that Jews control the world.

Avner Shalev, the chair of Yad Vashem, observed that a new toleration of anti-Semitism has emerged

He added that Israel's right to exist is being increasingly challenged by "significant voices."

In addition, Shalev talked briefly about Yad Vashem's achievements in the fields of education and research.

Hank Rosenbaum, the society's national chair, said that anti-Semitism can only be eradicated through education.

Gail Asper, whose Winnipeg-based family is deeply involved in Yad Vashem affairs, warned that anti-Semitism, if left unchecked, can consume freedom.

"The world still doesn't understand that what's bad for the Jews is bad for the world."

She was filling in for her father, media mogul Israel Asper, who died recently.

During the course of the evening, Asper was eulogized by a succession of speakers. Olmert, for example, described Asper as a great Canadian and a lover of Israel.

Art Eggleton, a Liberal MP, Canada's former defence minister and a member of Yad Vashem's board of directors, noted that a bill he co-sponsored to create an annual Holocaust Memorial Day was signed into law last month.

Leslie Dan, whose family donated funds for the establishment of a multimedia centre at Yad Vashem, talked about his experiences as a Holocaust survivor in Hungary.

He flew in from to China to attend the dinner.

Bob Rae, the former premier of Ontario, was master of ceremonies.

Holocaust symposium links students across Canada

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

One day the students took a virtual museum tour. Another was spent performing a play. The most recent activity was a cross-Canada video conference.

These may not sound like typical high school lessons, but at Vaughan Secondary School in Thornhill, Ont., a new interdisciplinary course called Genocide in the 20th century is taking Holocaust education to a new horizon.

"What makes interdisciplinary [learning] unique is that it appeals to different people," said teacher Jonathan Zinman, who spent several months developing the course before taking it live this September.

"The students get really creative."

An interdisciplinary course involves using dynamic resources and instructional techniques in order to engage the students in learning.

Zinman's most recent innovation was a Holocaust Video Conferencing Symposium that linked together students from Vaughan, Middlefield Collegiate Institute in Markham, Ont., and J. Percy Page in Edmonton.

Guest speakers at the different schools spoke about Holocaust education and followed with a question and answer session, with the cameras rolling and more than 100 students participating.

The audio equipment was not the best, but the students were still impressed with the technology.

"This shows the learning of the next generation," said Vaughan student Brandon Kleiman, 16.

George Preger, an educational consultant for Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, spoke to the students at Vaughan about his experiences as a child during the Holocaust.

"We have an excellent opportunity here to promote tolerance," said Preger, 67. "If we can do that, I think we have achieved much."

The students asked insightful questions that include 1 how Preger feels about searching for Nazi war criminals despite their old age.

"They felt very good about persecuting Jews who were in their 80s and 90s, and I think they bear responsibility for what they have done," Preger responded.

New interdisciplinary course

Arnold Friedman, a survivor of Auschwitz, spoke at Middlefield, where there are few Jewish students.

They were so enthralled with his lecture that he stayed for two hours.

Zinman hatched the video conferencing idea after connecting with the Advanced Broadband Enabled Learning (ABEL) program, which provides special technology links to assist in learning.

Other creative innovations he has used include displaying artwork of the Armenian genocide and having students develop their own children's book to teach a more contemporary view of Christopher Columbus' treatment of native peoples upon his "discovery" of the New World.

The students are also studying the genocides in Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia.

Sharon Kaur, a 17-year-old Sikh student at Vaughan, said the course has enlightened her.

"I've learned more than I expected," she said. "I learned about certain genocides that I hadn't heard about, like the Armenian genocide."

Zinman said about 30 per cent of the class is Jewish, and there are also Muslim, Sikh, Hindu and Christian students.

"Genocide is universal. It's applicable to everyone," Zinman said. "It's important for students to learn about prejudice and racial intolerance and how to prevent it."

Oslo accords hurt Israel, claims U.S. journalist

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel undermined its very legitimacy by signing the 1993 Oslo accords, claims American journalist Charles Krauthammer.

And now, due to the intifadah, Israel is paying the price for its "self-inflicted wounds," he told an overflow audience at Holy Blossom Temple last week.

Krauthammer, a conservative syndicated columnist who writes for The Washington Post and Time magazine, claimed the Oslo peace process legitimized Yasser Arafat and the PLO, whose objective, he said, is Israel's destruction.

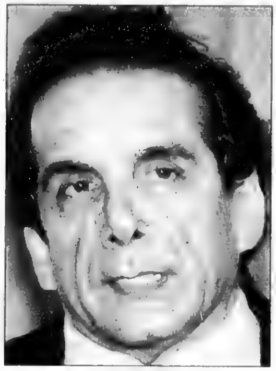
Arafat never intended to sign an end-of-conflict agreement with Ehud Barak at the 2000 Camp David summit, nor did he submit a counter offer, because he believes Israel's presence in the Middle East is only temporary.

Arafat's strategy is to wrest whatever territory he can from Israel and to use it as base from which to wage a war of attrition, suggested Krauthammer, a Pulitzer Prize winner.

Calculating that the PLO had reached a low ebb after the 1991 Gulf War and the collapse of the Soviet Union, Yitzhak Rabin, the Israeli prime minister, thought he could impose a settlement on Arafat through the Oslo accords.

But Rabin's calculations were wrong. "Rabin was too clever by half," Krauthammer observed.

By "saving" the PLO in its hour of weakness, Rabin inadvertently created "a monster."



Charles Krauthammer

"What is so painful about all this is that it was so obvious," said Krauthammer, an early opponent of Oslo.

Oslo generated " false optimism" and brought Israel no security.

In his estimation, Israel demonstrated "extraordinary weakness" by "appeasing" the Palestinians during the Oslo era.

Every concession went unrequited, and all Israel got in return was "a piece of paper."

There are two lessons to be learned from the breakdown of the Oslo process, according to Krauthammer.

The first is that Israel should have no illusions about Arafat and the PLO.

The second is that Israel cannot make territorial and political concessions to the Palestinian Authority unless the Palestinians accept Israel's legitimacy collectively and unequivocally.

Past Israeli concessions led to nothing more than "an intensification of hatred" against Israel, he said.

And he accused the Palestinian Authority of never having lived up to any of its Oslo obligations.

In his view, Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000 encouraged the Palestinians to launch the second uprising.

But by mounting intensive military operations directed at Palestinian militants in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, Israel is teaching the Palestinians that the "Lebanese model" is not working.

Israelis are currently fighting not for the settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, but for their homes in Israel, he declared.

Eventually, the settlements "will have to go" and Israel will have to agree to a two-state solution, Krauthammer noted.

But as long as Arafat controls the Palestinian Authority, the terrorism that has been unleashed since 2000 will not abate.

Krauthammer praised U.S. President George W. Bush for his advocacy of a new Palestinian leadership untainted by terrorism.

Describing Israel's new fence around the West Bank as essential to its security and as a symbol of the failure of negotiations with the Palestinians, Krauthammer lauded its potential benefits.

The barrier, part of which already has been built, will reduce terrorism, deprive the Palestinians of the strategic option to resort to terrorism and enable Israel to clearly define its border.

Blasting the road map to peace as "an illusion," Krauthammer commented it has no "constituency of seriousness" in Washington, and will not be implemented unless the Palestinians repudiate terrorism.

Citing the recent statement by Malaysia's prime minister that Jews control the world, and calling attention to a European survey that Israel is the greatest threat to peace, Krauthammer described the current times as "a very serious and dark moment in Jewish history."

Old-style anti-Semitism has returned to Europe, and Jews can no longer expect to "live off" the sentimental and moral capital of the Holocaust, he warned.

The world has turned against Jews, but the United States has become the only "bastion of support" for Israel and the Jewish people.

Fleischer takes Toronto inside White House

By ADI NEUBERGER
Special to The CJN

Ari Fleischer looked so familiar talking to the crowd, the only things missing were the White House seal, the national press corps and a CNN logo.

The former White House press secretary recently took Jewish community leaders behind the closed doors of the West Wing at a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Major Gifts dinner.

"Israel's well-being and safety was and continues to be, of paramount importance to the president," said Fleischer, who worked as George W. Bush's key spokesman for two years before leaving to head up his own communications firm.

Fleischer reassured community leaders of Bush's unwavering support of Israel, especially during the escalation of tension between Iraq and the United States.

He told the audience that during an Oval Office meeting just prior to the U.S. led attack on Iraq, Bush began a meeting by asking his Iraqi expatriate guests how the Iraqi people would react to the arrival of American troops. To Fleischer's complete amazement, Bush immediately went on to ask "what do Iraqis think of Israel?"

"At first I had no idea where he was going with this," admits Fleischer, "then I realized that keeping Israel alive is always on his mind."

In another tense top level meeting, the president and a key Arab leader discussed the competence of Palestinian President Yasser Arafat.

Angered by the leader's insistence that no other partner for peace could be expected to emerge among the Palestinians, Bush leaned in close to his counterpart, "to the point that their knees were touching" said Fleischer, and declared, "'Surely you have more faith in the Arab people than that? I have more faith in these people that they can come up with someone better.'

"This is what a leader does," said Fleischer. "Create a new status quo."

Fleischer maintains that this kind of steadfast determination, and Bush's willingness to place the onus for progress on the Palestinian people, was the hallmark of his commitment to Israel.

"Never did I hear the president use the term 'cycle of violence' when talking about the Israeli Palestinian conflict," added Fleischer. "There was no equal judgment."

Although Fleischer was always careful not to inject his own views into official White House positions, he was also mindful of being Jewish, and on one occasion wanted to shout it to the world.

At an afternoon briefing on the first day of Rosh Hashanah shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, Fleischer felt compelled to let Jewish viewers know that he did attend synagogue that morning.

He had asked his staff if it was appropriate to include that fact in his briefing. While they counselled him against it, Fleischer, who sought his rabbi's approval to go into work that day, managed to work it in anyway.

He responded to a reporter's question about a meeting he was unable to go to by telling the journalist he couldn't attend because he was at synagogue.

"It felt so right to put on my hat and say I was in synagogue that morning."

Pearl murdered for his secrets, says author

"The moderates can defeat the radicals, but it won't be easy or short."

Levy said that Pearl held similar views, and although Levy did not know him personally, he learned much about his subject by talking to his parents and widow, Mariane.

"Pearl was not naive," he said. "He was a careful reporter, a real good journalist, one of the best. Anyone could have fallen into his trap. I could have, too."

Pearl made a fatal error by placing his trust in Sheikh. The latter promised to put Pearl in touch with Sheik Mubarak Ali Shah Gilani, a Muslim cleric who apparently knew Reid, the terrorist who tried to bring down an American airliner en route from Paris to Miami.

In investigating Pearl's murder, Levy never thought he was endangering himself. "But sometimes I felt nervous, of course, such as when I spent a night in the same hotel in Pakistan where Pearl stayed."

He admits he did not disclose his Jewish identity while hunting down leads in Pakistan.

"I never said I was not Jewish. But when I was interrogated about my religion, I said I was an atheist, which is true."

Levy disputed the veracity of a recent news story suggesting that Pearl's murderer was in fact Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"I'm not so sure he was the actual killer, though it may be true he gave the final order to kill Pearl. What I don't believe is that Khalid Mohammed was the real killer."

Levy does not subscribe to the notion that Islam is a mortal enemy of Jews. "A lot of Muslims are ready to shake hands with Jews," he said.

But he is concerned that a coalition of Muslim fundamentalists, new radicals and old anti-Semites is working together against Jews and Israel.

Levy warned that if moderate Muslims do not challenge the radicals in their midst, they will bring disaster upon themselves.

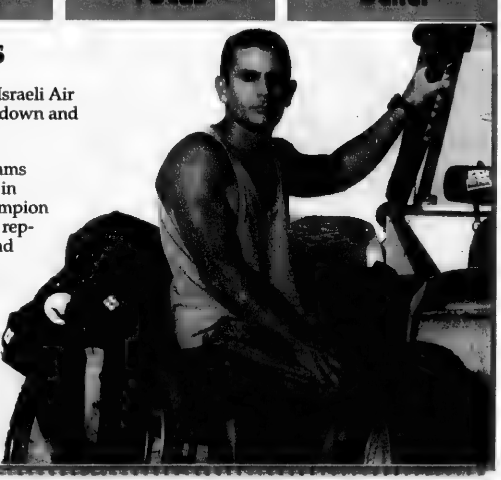
Dror Cohen: He who dares wins

At the young age of 24, Dror Cohen, a fighter pilot and instructor at the Israeli Air Force's Flight School was injured, leaving him paralyzed from the waist down and confined to a wheelchair.

Today, thanks to the therapy, rehabilitation and specialized sports programs offered at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv, Dror is a leading athlete in disabled sports in Israel. His titles include Israeli Ski and Water Ski Champion for several years and Israeli Sailing Champion in the Sonar class; he also represented Israel in the 2000 Sydney Olympic Games. Dror owns an off-road buggy and placed 1st three times and 2nd twice in rallies during the last three years.

"I have overcome many obstacles since my accident, and I have proved both to myself and to society that despite my physical disability there is nothing I cannot do, however difficult, even when competing against able-bodied people.

"Beit Halochem has given me the support and encouragement needed to overcome my disabilities. Life has taught me that 'he who dares wins'.



Lodzer Centre congregation marks 50 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

To the best of David Rybowski's knowledge, the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation is the only synagogue of its kind in North America, a spiritual home formed by a group of Holocaust survivors.

On Nov. 30, Rybowski – the synagogue president – and a crowd of about 200 will celebrate the shul's 50th anniversary at a gala dinner. Although the synagogue itself opened only in 1981, the anniversary recalls its 1953 inception as a mutual benefit society for families from Lodz who had recently arrived in Toronto.

The society, which ceased to exist once the synagogue became a reality, was focused around members helping each other, socializing, and helping Israel, according to Rybowski, who is also the 50th anniversary co-chair along with Dorothy Tessis.

"We were like a family," Rybowski, 80, said in an interview at the North York synagogue. Within the first six years, the society raised enough money to erect a monument at Bathurst Lawn cemetery. Between 1955 and 1978, Rybowski recalls, they sent nine ambulances to Israel. In 1973, a substantial sum of money was raised for Israel at an emergency meeting.

Over the years there were also Chanukah parties and New Year's parties. "We had lots of fun in those days."

Programs these days include Tot Shabbat, Mommy and Me, a recent talk by journalist Martin Himel, and a screening of the documentary Undying Love as part of Holocaust Education Week. The film includes the poignant love story of Rybowski and his wife Zenia. A cantorial concert is planned for Dec. 17.

Rybowski, who has been on the board of the Lodzer since 1954, remembers negotiating the land purchase for the synagogue. Many of his cronies from that time are no longer alive, but stalwarts like Isaac Peters, 84, and Joseph Lupka, 89, can be found at the synagogue every day. Lupka, a former gabbai, said it's a second home. He and Peters recall the early days when there was no support staff to help members set up chairs or keep the building functioning.

Although the two men had businesses that needed attention, "when we had time we came over," said Peters.

The synagogue is not formally affiliated with any denomination, but its liturgy and services are Conservative in nature. Rabbi Matthew Kaufman, who was hired just over a year ago and who serves the congregation with Cantor David Edwards, is overseeing the move to more egalitarian services.

It was a hard sell for some of the more traditional older members, acknowledged Rybowski, but ultimately the board endorsed the decision. Personally, he said, he feels the important thing is that members are happy and the shul is "running in order."

As of last year, women are permitted to have an aliyah. Currently, the congregation is involved in a three-month trial of counting women in the minyan. The board will vote on whether or not to make the change permanent.

"I think there is an openness [at the Lodzer] to trying new things and listening to new ways of doing things," said Rabbi Kaufman. "I think there's a real excitement for the future."

As the father of a 9-month-old son, Rabbi Kaufman is in the same demographic as many of the newer members of the shul. In the fall 2003 synagogue bulletin, he wrote that his son Abie has dozens of "bubbies" and "zaidies" among the synagogue members, in addition to his own grandparents.

"For this Holocaust survivor community, the arrival of a new life means another victory over death and despair," he wrote.

Rybowski, whose father was a dance teacher in Lodz, likes to dance with baby Abie. For him, the synagogue is also, in many ways, a baby – his baby. "My dream is that the second or young generation should take over and run it as a shul that shall never go under."

With 38 new member families in the last six months, Rybowski has reason to be hopeful about the future. "Right now we have every age," he said. "Our generation is dying off. Unfortunately we lost a lot of members." In 2002 alone, 17 original members died.

Dina Wolfe, who has run the synagogue office for more than a decade, said she has "a great deal of respect for the survivors with whom she works.

"I love their ownership of this. It's their synagogue. They're not just members."

Although her duties are administrative in nature, she says she feels more like a mother hen. "I don't know what it is about this congregation. They're just a great bunch of people."

A child survivor herself, Wolfe added, "If you stop and think, in the early '50s right after the war, people came here with know-how, but no money – and they started this. Tell me credit isn't due to them."

A bar mitzvah in the ghetto

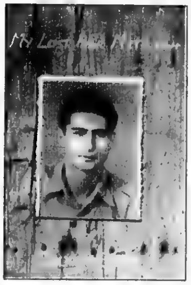
By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

George Stern was an eight-year-old student in Ujpest, a suburb 10 kilometres east of Budapest when World War II broke out.

Review

In his recently published book My Lost Bar Mitzvah, Stern, now living in Toronto, writes about his childhood, which was normal even after the beginning of the war, until the invasion of Hungary by the German army on March 19, 1944.

His bar mitzvah was scheduled to take place four weeks later in the synagogue, but the synagogue was closed by the Nazis.



In his memoirs, Stern describes his bar mitzvah day in his home, where they barely had a minyan. The Jews were living in a crowded ghetto, travel was restricted and those who were there wore yellow stars.

Stern takes the reader through escape after escape and describes what it was like to go into hiding at the age of 13. "I felt like a hunted animal," he says.

He writes of the death of his mother in Auschwitz, the loss of most of her family and the liberation by the Russian army.

Stern's book traces his life after the war, an odyssey that began with membership in a Mizrachi Zionist group, making aliyah in 1948 at the age of 17 in a crowded Greek cargo ship and life as a pioneer in Israel.

On his arrival in Israel, he enlisted in the army in Haifa. He later joined the Israel Air Force and worked in radar and radio communications. In his book, he presents a panorama of life in Israel through the Sinai War in 1956. After 12 years in Israel, where he had difficulty making a living, he decided to move his wife Judy and their two small children, Paul and Iris, to Brazil.

When riots broke out in Brazil in 1968, he decided to move again, this time to Toronto, where his wife had family. The Sterns travelled to Uruguay, Argentina, Peru and Los Angeles, and completed their trip to Toronto by car.

In Toronto, with the children in school, the Sterns both went to study English at George Brown College and vegan their new life in Canada.

"The main inspiration for writing the book was my grandsons, Jordan Stern, 16, and Noah Yashinsky, 14," Stern says. "When they were little, I would babysit for them and tell them stories of my life. They asked me to put the stories on paper."

He says he included a section with family pictures, "so my family who perished in the war will be remembered." He adds that he wants people to know that even in the worst places, there are some righteous people.

A member of Beth Tikvah Synagogue for more than 25 years, he says, "I believe that it is important to believe in God and to maintain Jewish traditions. That's what kept me going and alive throughout the war."

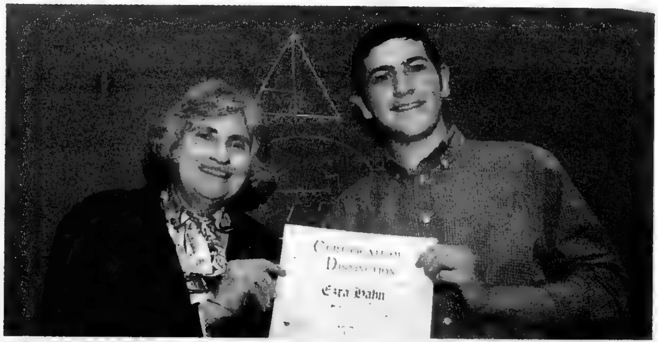
Rabbi Wayne Allan of Beth Tikvah Synagogue writes in the forward: "George Stern tells his story in a remarkably unexpected way. It is undramatic – even nonchalant – in style and yet tells a powerfully dramatic and poignant story: his story.

"It is a story about overcoming hate and persecution. It is a story about the fall of Budapest to the Nazis and their sympathizers and the struggle of one family to save their dignity and humanity as well as their lives."

Stern, who visits Israel frequently, says on his recent trip, "I recognized a feeling of shock and desperation – economically and spiritually. Many young people told me that the future is not clear to them anymore."

He says he believes in the Bible. "I know we will prevail in Israel. Despite the disturbances and terrorists, we will prevail."

My Lost Bar Mitzvah was featured at the Toronto Jewish Book Fair and is available at Judaica shops.



MATH COMPETITION: Ezra Hahn, Grade 12 math student at Yeshivat Or Chaim is presented with a gold certificate for placing in the top 4 per cent of all Canadian students in the Hypatia Math competition by his teacher, Mrs H. Gelfand. The Hypatia is the advanced second round competition that one is allowed to enter after competing in the earlier Fermat contest. The Fermat consists of multiple choice answers while the Hypatia demands full solutions. The average result for Hypatia candidates is 13/40. Ezra scored 37/40. This score puts him about 28 of 2080 entrants.

Israeli deputy mayor fights two battles for Kedumim

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Raphaella Segal, the assistant mayor of Kedumim, believes that Israel is fighting two different battles: one against the Palestinians and one against the international community.

Kedumim, one of the first Jewish towns in the West Bank settled after 1967, is situated on the mountaintops overlooking Israel's coastal plain, just two miles west of Nablus (Shechem) and 12 miles east of Kfar Saba and Netanya.

Segal said in an interview in Toronto that the town was settled in 1973, after seven unsuccessful attempts, she said, to "challenge a law that forbade Jewish settlement in the centre of the Jewish homeland and settle mountaintops around Schechem." Each time, they were forced to evacuate.

Eventually, the government could no longer withstand the grassroots movement and compromised by allowing 30 families to settle in the nearby army camp of Kadum. From those initial difficult living conditions, the pioneering families developed permanent settlements.

Kedumim now has 750 families and a population of 4,000. The community, the word Segal prefers to settlement, has several different yeshivot, including one for boys who have attention deficit disorder, as well as separate high schools for girls and boys, kindergartens and day-care centres. It is home to more than 30 families from Ethiopia and 80 from the former Soviet Union.

"We have families from North America, South America and France," Segal said, adding that "regardless of lifestyle and religious commitment, all Jewish inhabitants are welcomed."

Now, she said, the many communities that have evolved in the West Bank and Gaza since 1967 have found themselves on Israel's front lines. Many of them have had to deal with death and injuries to friends and family members resulting from terrorist attacks.

Yet their level of devotion to the land is intense and they are determined to stay, Segal said.

"Education is an important part of the upbringing in our communities," Segal said. "Children from our towns go into special army units and become officers and pilots because they are taught to appreciate the land and the need to defend their country. Many become professionals and academics."

The mother of nine children doesn't believe that peace depends on the dismantling of the settlements. She believes the Palestinian leadership has focused on the liberation of all of Israel – on Haifa, Tel Aviv and Acco – and not on the towns that have emerged in the West Bank since 1967.

For that reason, she said, "the 250,000 inhabitants of the 144 communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza actually contribute to the security and safety of Israel."

Israel's other battle, Segal said, involves convincing the western world that the Jordan Valley should be included in Israel proper, despite the fact that this would mean Israeli Jews would be quickly outnumbered by Palestinians.

"The world should stop expecting the Jewish state to conform to the same terminology that is used between England and Belgium or Canada and the United States.

"Israel is functioning in a region of the world that doesn't guarantee political or human rights to any of its citizens."

According to Segal, a solution to the demographic problem would guarantee human rights, not political rights, to the Palestinians that live within Israel's borders.

"The Palestinians could have autonomy over their towns and villages and control their schools and industry," she said.

"However, the Palestinians should only have voting rights in Jordan. Not in Israel."

November traditions

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

Rabbinic Reflections

In recent years, the Jewish people in North America have established two new annual traditions to help us remember our history and strengthen our commitment to Torah and the Jewish way of life: Holocaust Education Week and Jewish Book Month.

Remembering our history has been an important factor in the survival of the Jewish people. Torah scholars and the sages established rituals, customs and prayers that help us recall these events.

At the Pesach seders, we relive the Exodus and see ourselves as though we were freed from slavery.

On Chanukah, we celebrate our victory over the attempt by our enemies to make us assimilate and give up basic mitzvot of the Torah such as observing Shabbat and keeping kashrut.

Celebrating history in this way helps unify the Jewish people throughout the world.

Holocaust Education Week not only reminds us of the horrors of the destruction of the Jewish communities in eastern Europe, but it also remind us that the Jewish people found the strength to establish the State of Israel. Today, there is a thriving North American Jewish community where we are much more optimistic about our survival than we were at the beginning of the 20th century.

Jewish Book Month is in keeping with the fact that the Jewish people are also known as Am Hasefer – the people of the Book – and to the fact that we were the first to ensure that everyone in the community would be literate and able to read Hebrew. While there always was a special class of scholars and sages, Jewish learning was not limited to this handful but available to all Jews.

In eastern Europe, many Jewish communities had classes ranging from Bible for the masses to talmudic studies for a select group. In North America, too, there has been a tremendous rebirth of learning, with more Jewish people from all walks of life studying and becoming familiar with the essential books of Judaism. It is also worthwhile to mention that an increasing number of people who use the Internet are able to receive daily and weekly lessons on Jewish texts at home.

There is a common message sent through Holocaust Education Week and Jewish Book Month reminding us not to take for granted the freedom and blessings we enjoy. All of our holidays and celebrations strengthen our continuity as a people and as the Am Hasefer.

A moment in the tent

Midrashic Moments

One of the more complex narratives in the book of Genesis is the story of Isaac lying on his deathbed, ready to bless his eldest son Esau. Rebecca, the matriarch, tells her son Jacob to disguise himself as Esau and receive the blessing of covenant from Isaac in place of Esau. Jacob follows the plan and dons Esau's clothes, while his mother, Rebecca, places goat hair upon Jacob's arms and back of his neck. Since Isaac's vision is failing, the assumption is that if he touches Jacob, he will feel thick hair similar to Esau and the deception will hold true.

There is much debate through the ages over the deception described in the Torah. Understandably, most of the debate focuses on Rebecca and Jacob and the plot they enacted to trick Isaac. Esau, as the father of the Edomites, is traditionally viewed as evil and therefore it is seen as fitting that the covenant not pass to him.

Rabbinic literature on this matter is quite complex and reflects an intricate political world in which Esau symbolizes nations and empires in Jewish history. Yet the Torah text subtly portrays a parent-child relationship between Isaac and Esau that all but disappears in the larger scheme of things.

We are told that Isaac loves Esau, for the "taste of the hunt is in his mouth." Esau is the hunter, the protector, and Isaac has found solace and refuge in his eldest son. When Isaac asks Esau to prepare Isaac's favourite treats, Esau knows how to do it. Jacob, we are told, does not, and it is Rebecca who prepares the food.

When Jacob is clothed as Esau, he wears his brother's finest clothes. We infer that Esau would dress formally to sit with his father. Once inside the tent, the narrative becomes quite personal. Isaac asks Jacob to approach so that he may touch him. He feels the goat hair and believes he is touching Esau. But Rebecca has also put hair on Jacob's neck, an unlikely place for Isaac to touch. Rebecca knows that there are favourite spots on a child every parent likes to touch. It varies from child to child and parent to parent. She believes that Isaac will reach for the neck of his son, his favourite spot, and therefore she places hair there.

Isaac subsequently asks Jacob to kiss him, and during this kiss, Isaac smells his son and recognizes the aroma issuing from the clothes. Again, a subtle parenting moment: parents enjoy the smell of their children and starting in infancy, parents often smell their children. Whether consciously or not, a parental kiss is often accompanied with a deep inhale of breath.

Aside from the passing of covenant – the larger issue in the narrative – there is the inner portrayal of a relationship, of the bond between a father and his favoured son. Every moment in Torah is a moment of learning, and beyond the rabbinic portrayal of a wicked Esau lies a moment of learning for parents and children.

Genesis Rabbah acknowledges this moment when it states: "R. Simeon ben Gamaliel said: All my lifetime I attended upon my father, yet I did not do for him a hundredth part of what Esau did for his father."

Romance and dating

If you search for the words "Jewish" and "Dating" on the Internet, be prepared to be sucked down a giant vortex of matchmakers, shadchanim and know-it-alls ready to pair you with your bashert. Of course, matchmakers are part of a time-honoured Jewish tradition and they can fulfil a key role. Whether or not you're getting outside assistance, you could benefit from sage advice on the Web from people who want to help you find romance. But with so many people trying to sell you something online, quality, free advice is hard to find. I'll try to point you in the right direction.

The Jewish Highway

The aish.com Web site has lots of advice for those seeking love and romance – not surprising when you consider Aish HaTorah created SpeedDating. The articles are written by rabbis, rebbitzens, psychotherapists, lawyers and social workers in an informative and sometimes blunt tone. "Many (not all) men who are single into their 30s have become more one-dimensional as they age." The Dating Advice section has articles on "Why Doesn't He Call?" "Lying on a Dating Profile" and the always popular "Getting the Guy to Budge."

Great Dating Wisdom addresses some of the eternal mysteries: "Does Love Conquer All?" "How Do we Know When to Hang On and When to Let Go?" and "How to Survive Getting Dumped" (Some tips: learn what you can and move on, and resist the urge to wallow.) The SpeedDating article about "Inappropriate Date Topics" – pointedly illustrated with a can brimming with worms – has some words of wisdom: The goal of a date is to create an accurate impression of yourself. While disclosing personal disappointments, failed relationships and family details may be factual, it won't paint a proper picture of the real you. [http://www.aish.com/dating/]

The GenerationJ Relationships Archive holds many other thought-provoking articles. In "My Male Yenta," Anne Miller shares the following: "I have my very own personal yenta, and he is a stocky middle-aged married man named Ron." How successful is Ron? You'll have to sign on to find out. In "I Wore a Wonderbra to the Matzah Ball," Caroline Tiger tells of her first foray to a Jewish singles event after having avoided that kind of gathering for most of her life. And in "The Rabbi" Allison Kaplan attends a lecture by Rabbi Akiva Tatz, who explains that relationships require work, especially when they have lost their initial sheen. Kaplan wasn't convinced. "Actually, I found myself thinking more about an ex-boyfriend than my fiancé. Thinking that if I had sought Rabbi Tatz's advice way back during those terrible times, I might still be stuck in that dead-end relationship." [http://www.GenerationJ.com/archive/relationships/articles.html]

The Feb. 2001 issue of GenerationJ has more relationship articles including "A Match Made in Henna" and a lovely ode to longtime romance, Ted Roberts' "A Fifty Year Waltz, and Counting." [http://www.GenerationJ.com/archive/02_2001/feb.html]

While in the neighbourhood, check out GenerationJ's sister sites, JVibe [http://www.jvibe.com], teen-written JewZ.com [http://jewz.com/] and MzVibe for Ophira's advice column, MzGuided. [http://www.mzvibe.com/mzplaced/mzplaced17.shtml]

Finally, like any good Jewish site, GenerationJ refers to the Torah for the "Top 14 Biblical Ways to Get a Wife." [http://www.GenerationJ.com/archive/relationships/joke.html] Some ideas:

- From Adam: "Have God create a wife for you while you sleep. Note: this will cost you."
- From Samson: "When you see someone you like, go home and tell your parents, 'I have seen a… woman; now get her for me.' If your parents question your decision, simply say, 'Get her for me. She's the one for me.'"
- From Jacob: "Agree to work seven years in exchange for a woman's hand in marriage. Get tricked into marrying the wrong woman. Then work another seven years for the woman you wanted to marry in the first place. That's right. 14 years of toil for a wife."

Arab states always shied from refugee issue

MYTH:

The Arab states have always welcomed the Palestinians and done their best to resettle them.

FACT:

Jordan was the only Arab country to welcome the Palestinians and grant them citizenship (to this day, Jordan is the only Arab country where Palestinians as a group can become citizens). King Abdullah considered the Palestinian Arabs and Jordanians one people. By 1950, he annexed the West Bank and forbade the use of the term "Palestine" in official documents.

MYTHS FACTS

Although demographic figures indicated ample room for settlement existed in Syria, Damascus refused to consider accepting any refugees, except those who might refuse repatriation. Syria also declined to resettle 85,000 refugees in 1952-54, though it had been offered international funds to pay for the project. Iraq was also expected to accept a large number of refugees, but proved unwilling. Lebanon insisted it had no room for the Palestinians. In 1950, the UN tried to resettle 150,000 refugees from Gaza in Libya, but was rebuffed by Egypt.

After the 1948 war, Egypt controlled the Gaza Strip and its more than 200,000 inhabitants, but refused to allow the Palestinians into Egypt or permit them to move elsewhere. Egypt's handling of Palestinians in Gaza was so bad, Saudi Arabian radio compared Nasser's regime in Gaza to Hitler's rule in occupied Europe during World War II.

In 1952, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) set up a fund of $200 million (US) to provide homes and jobs for the refugees, but it went untouched.

Little has changed in succeeding years. Arab governments have frequently offered jobs, housing, land and other benefits to Arabs and non-Arabs, excluding Palestinians. For example, Saudi Arabia chose not to use unemployed Palestinian refugees to alleviate its labor shortage in the late 1970s and early 1980s. Instead, thousands of South Koreans and other Asians were recruited to fill jobs.

The situation grew even worse in the wake of the Gulf War. Kuwait, which employed large numbers of Palestinians but denied them citizenship, expelled more than 300,000 of them. "If people pose a security threat, as a sovereign country we have the right to exclude anyone we don't want," the Kuwaiti ambassador to the United States, Saud Nasir Al-Sabah, was reported as saying (Jerusalem Report, June 27, 1991).

Today, Palestinian refugees in Lebanon do not have social and civil rights and have very limited access to public health or educational facilities. The majority rely entirely on UNRWA as the sole provider of education, health and relief and social services. Considered foreigners, Palestinian refugees are prohibited by law from working in more than 70 trades and professions.

The Palestinian refugees held the UN responsible for ameliorating their condition; nevertheless, many were unhappy with the treatment they were receiving from their Arab brethren. Some, like Palestinian nationalist leader Musa Alami, were incredulous: "It is shameful that the Arab governments should prevent the Arab refugees from working in their countries and shut the doors in their faces and imprison them in camps," he was quoted in the Middle East Journal. Most refugees, however, blamed "the Zionists," for their predicament rather than the vanquished Arab armies.

In August 1958, Ralph Garroway, the director of UNRWA, said, "The Arab states do not want to solve the refugee problem. They want to keep it as an open sore, as an affront to the United Nations and as a weapon against Israel. Arab leaders don't give a damn whether the refugees live or die."

Israeli identity said based on history, not myth

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israeli and Diaspora Jews differ in the way they position themselves within history, says Israeli novelist A.B. Yehoshua.

In a talk at the 27th annual Jewish Book Fair last week, Yehoshua quoted Jewish scholar and philosopher Gershon Scholem, saying Zionism has repositioned Jews within history. Diaspora Jews, on the other hand, define their identity through a collective memory, or mythology, that has centred on the Bible.

Described by the New York Times as "a kind of Israeli Faulkner," Yehoshua is a professor of literature at Haifa University and the recipient of several literary awards, including the Israel and Bialik prizes.

In a lecture called "The Israeli Writer: Between Mythology and History," Yehoshua said for 2,000 years, the Jewish people regarded history as events involving others.

Jews lived without ever learning about the history of people around them, he said. As an example, he said yeshiva students didn't care when or where Rambam lived. They were concerned with his understanding of text, not with the man as a historical figure.

However, with the evolution of Zionism, Israeli Jews returned to a place in time where their actions affected others in the wider community, who in turn had an impact on them, he said.

A.B. Yehoshua

Yehoshua began writing his first novel, Mr. Mani, in 1982, the year his father died suddenly from cancer and Israel invaded Lebanon.

In an effort to understand why his country felt the need to liberate Lebanon, he decided to look beyond current events and delve into history. Mr. Mani traces a modern Israeli family back through six generations, beginning in 19th-century Greece and Poland through to British Mandate Palestine and German-controlled Crete.

"In each chapter, I had to learn about a different period and a different environment," the author said.

Yehoshua's next book, Open Heart, was written during Oslo when a sense of optimism allowed him to take a break from Israel and its history. However, he returned to the exploration of history with A Journey to the End of the Millenium, a look at the relationship between eastern and western Jewish cultures.

Yehoshua, a fifth-generation Israeli on his father's side and Moroccan on his mother's side, believes that modern-day Israeli culture has emerged from a combination of eastern and western traditions. He considers himself an Oriental Jew with western perceptions.

The book, which takes place in the year 999 when 90 per cent of the Jewish world lived within Arab-dominated cultures, centres around the practice of bigamy and the relationship between a Jewish merchant from Tangiers and his in-laws in Worms, on the River Rhine.

The challenge was to describe the people of that time without patronizing them, Yehoshua said.

His new book, The Liberated Bride, returns to Israel in 1998, just before the outbreak of the current intifadah. It explores a time when Israelis thought that peace was just around the corner and Arabs and Jews could coexist in the same land without real borders.

At that time, Yehoshua recalled that Israelis were shopping in Ramallah and going to dentists in Jenin. However, efforts to live together that way were a mistake, he said.

"We poisoned each other."

The Liberated Bride is about the need to establish boundaries, Yehoshua said, adding that borders distinguish Israelis from Diaspora Jews.

Throughout history, Jews were experts in crossing borders, without ever needing anything beyond their Jewish identity. However, Zionism has forced Israelis to define their boundaries and take responsibility for their sovereignty, he said.

"Palestinians would like to dissolve borders to claim a demographic victory. However, Israelis realize that it is crucial to establish boundaries and separate the two people."

The dangers of the new anti-Semitism

By WENDY LAMPERT

According to parliamentarian Irwin Cotler, the Jewish world is witnessing a new, escalating and lethal anti-Semitism.

"The new anti-Semitism is a discrimination against, a denial of, and an assault on the right of Israel to live as an equal member in the family of nations," Cotler told a group of more than 55 members of UJA Federation's ATID division at a breakfast last week.

ATID, the Hebrew word for future, is a division that engages a new generation of donors and builds new leaders through educational programming.

"We have moved from anti-Semitism as discrimination against individuals to anti-Semitism as discrimination against Israel as a nation and a people," he said.

Cotler described four important indicators of the new anti-Semitism and anti-Jewishness pervading the world at this time. The most lethal, he said, is genocidal anti-Semitism – the public call for the destruction of Israel and the Jewish people.

Cotler, the Member of Parliament for Mount Royal and a former Law Professor at McGill University, noted that this form of anti-Semitism manifests itself in the covenants of terror groups and the call by one UN member state, Iran, for the destruction of another member state, Israel.

Political anti-Semitism is also dangerous, said Cotler. "It is the singling out of the essence of the Jewish condition for discrimination and the denial of self-determination and legitimacy of the Jewish state." Equally frightening is the trend by political bodies to attribute "all the evils in the world" to Israel, which is, in turn, influencing individuals. Recent polls indicate that more than half of all Europeans believe Israel is the greatest threat to world peace.

Ideological anti-Semitism, through which Israel is demonized under the rubric of anti-racism, is another insidious form of hatred, said Cotler. "Israel is seen as the new apartheid state…destroying it is held out as a moral obligation."

That view of Israel has disenfranchised the country at the UN and has created what Cotler calls "legalized anti-Semitism." There is an obsessive preoccupation with Israel as a violator of human rights, while member states that are true human rights violators "are not even touched," he said.

And yet, Cotler sees the UN as a necessary international body. "We have to ensure that the UN isn't used as a protective cover for anti-Semitism. But the answer is to hold the UN to account, not to dismantle it."

Cotler said Israel, like any other state, must be accountable under international law, which would be applied equally to all states. Espousing that principle "should be a matter of Canadian foreign policy," he said. "This is not just a Jewish cause – this is a common human cause."

Cotler believes the Jewish people will survive this new wave of anti-Semitism, just as they have survived assaults throughout history. "While anti-Semitism is an enduring hatred, the Jews are an enduring people."

The fight against anti-Semitism is a key component of UJA Federation Campaign 2004.

The human cost of terror

By CHEN KOTAS-BAR, Ma'ariv

When Eyal Neifeld is asked what his hardest moments are, he lists three: when he wants to change a light bulb at home, when he wants to fry an omelet, and when he wants to drive. Three things he wants to do, but cannot.

Last August, Neifeld was critically injured in a terror attack on bus line 361 at the Meron Junction, near Tzfat, in which nine people were killed and 43 were wounded. Neifeld lost his sight and hearing, but innovative surgery at Sheba Hospital restored 30% of his hearing in one ear with the help of an electronic implant. Neifeld also suffered burns everywhere, several broken body parts and cracks to his skull. His spleen was taken out and, as of today, two fingers do not function. He has undergone more than 40 operations and additional surgery still awaits him.

On the day of the terror attack, he was supposed to be returning from home to his army base. "I was sitting in the rear of the bus, on the right, behind the door," he says, reconstructing the scene. "The terrorist got on the bus at the Arab village of Sajur. He was smiling. The terrorist came up to me and asked if he could take the inside seat. He had no accent, nothing. He then moved to the inside. He was wearing a kibbutz hat, sunglasses, a yellow shirt, green pants, biblical sandals. He was clean-shaven and neat as a pin - I suspected nothing."

Later on, Neifeld noticed the terrorist go over and whisper something to two Arab girls, and then come back and sit down next to him. "The Arab girls got off the bus," says Neifeld. "I thought nothing of it. At the Meron Junction, I got up to get off the bus. The terrorist stood up after I did. A soldier who moved past me, apparently also wanting to get off, stood between us. I heard something indistinct, a cry. I looked around - the whole thing happened in a hundredth of a second."

Despite the agonizing trauma that he suffered, Neifeld refuses to give in. He is currently learning how to work on a computer and he plans to register for university to study economics and business administration. It took only two weeks for Neifeld to learn to read Braille and walk with a cane. And the news gets better. He and his girlfriend intend to wed next year. The doctors say that he is a success story, a rare case of rehabilitation under such circumstances.

Neifeld, however, is modest and does not feel heroic. However, there are, he admits, difficult moments. "There is the maddening darkness I live in twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. Pitch-black darkness - an endless, formless, colourless, motionless black space. I try not to think about it… Today, life is too dear to me; I try to look at the glass as half full - I'm alive."

UJA Federation Campaign 2004 is raising funds to expand assistance for victims of terror, battle a worldwide wave of anti-Semitism and educate students about how to deal with anti-Jewish intimidation on campus.

New world-class centre of Jewish life for midtown Toronto

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

As Toronto's vibrant Jewish community continues its rapid growth, an exciting project is underway in the heart of Jewish Toronto to ensure the delivery of 21st century services and programs to its residents.

Since November 2001, Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's (JTT) Central Campus Development Committee, chaired by Peter Cohen, has overseen the creation of a vision for a new 230,000 square foot community campus in the midtown Toronto Bathurst-Sheppard area.

That vision - with culture and Jewish learning at its core - involves a transformation of the site which currently houses the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, the Koffler Centre of the Arts and the Lipa Green Building for Jewish community services into a new state-of-the-art, world-class centre of Jewish life, featuring eight centres of excellence delivering distinctive community services.

The eight centres of excellence are:

- A new and revitalized Koffler Centre of the Arts
- The Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Learning
- The Centre for Collective Memory and Understanding
- The Centre for Active Seniors
- The Centre for Health, Wellness and Recreation
- Children's Education Centre
- Community Services Centre
- Centre for Celebration

While construction is scheduled to begin approximately one year from now, with an expected opening date in 2007, the design and planning stages have begun in earnest.

"I am very excited about this outstanding project," says Cohen. "The design process is going well and we are aggressively working with our partners to develop concept drawings for each component of the project. On the planning side, each planning group is meeting regularly to look at programs, space and operational issues. Its impact will be felt not only by the Jewish community of Toronto, but by other communities as well, both locally and internationally."

"Extensive research into successful cultural and communal centres in other urban areas continues to provide inspiration and instill confidence that we can create a place that is unique for the Jewish community of Toronto," says Robin Gofine, Director, Community Planning, Jewish Toronto Tomorrow.

Examples of such centres include the Skirball Cultural Centre in Los Angeles, the new JCC in Manhattan, the Winnipeg Jewish Community Campus, the Jewish Centre for Arts and Culture in Boston, the Cumming Centre for Seniors in Montreal and the Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles.

"With these plans for the Central Campus – especially the Koffler Centre that will make Toronto a world leader in the arts – JTT is building the Jewish community, assuring Jewish continuity, as well as strengthening Jewish identity," says Shoshana Pakciarz, Executive Director of Boston's New Centre for Arts and Culture.

Peter Cohen (left) Chair, JTT's Central Campus Development Committee, studies plans for the new site.

"This Centre will bring Jews of all backgrounds together under one roof. We need these communities in the Diaspora, especially as new generations float further and further away from Israel."

"Forty years ago, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre was built because Jews had nowhere else to go," says Cohen. "Today some community members have everywhere to go. We are building something wonderful that will bring them back to the community."

The new 230,000 square foot state-of-the-art Central Campus will be one of North America's leading cultural and communal centres.

Canadian Jewry receives royal welcome in England

Canada sent the largest delegation of all Commonwealth countries represented at the recent Commonwealth Jewish Council Conference, held in London, England.

Nine members of Toronto's Jewish community made the trip while two from both Ottawa and Montreal also participated.

Delegates representing 20 Jewish communities from countries such as Australia, Hong Kong, India, South Africa and Zimbabwe were on hand for this year's biennial conference, which dealt with anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism.

The Commonwealth Jewish Council, founded in 1982, was created to provide links among Jewish communities in 36 Commonwealth countries.

Those who made the trek from Canada were Dorothy and Cyril Reitman, Joel and Jill Reitman, Sam and Richard Reitman, Marsha Bronfman, Lisa and Jared Genser, Peter and Ricki Cohen and Joseph and Ruth Viner.

Following the four-day conference, the delegates were invited to a royal reception, where they met with the Queen and Prince Phillip, before attending the annual awards dinner.

"This year's conference was the most extraordinary event we've ever organized," said conference Chair Lord Grenville Janner, during a telephone interview from London. "Not only was it remarkable due to the size of the delegations, but because of the variety and stature of the delegates who participated. In the case of the Canadian delegation, it was the largest group and, as always, its members were very distinguished and extremely involved in Jewish issues and concerns."

Joel Reitman, a veteran of previous conferences, said that this year's event was even more urgent due to today's worldwide resurgence of virulent anti-Semitism.

"The highlight of this year's conference for me was hearing from delegates who represent Judaism from all around the world," he said. "It's incredible to meet with, and discuss our commonalities as Jews, despite the fact that in some cases we live on the other side of the globe. It shows just how much a family we – as Jews – are, regardless of our geographical placement."

Delegates at the recent Commonwealth Jewish Council Conference in London, England, watch as their children present Queen Elizabeth with flowers following a reception she hosted at St. James Palace. Lord Grenville Janner, (far right) Chair of the Conference, looks on.

Reitman, who spent time with former South African president Nelson Mandela during a past conference, said that meeting the Queen this year was equally exciting.

"The Queen is very involved in anything to do with the Commonwealth, and so, by extension, she's involved in the Commonwealth Jewish Council," said Reitman. "She seemed genuinely warm and caring to all of us, but I think she has a special connection with Toronto since Prince Andrew spent some time at school near here. The function she hosted at the palace was wonderful and completely glatt kosher."

York Hillel endorses student govt. slate

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

York University's Hillel is endorsing a slate for student government elections being held Nov. 20 to 26.

The move is "a bit controversial," admits Hillel president Jordie Saperia, who is running for Faculty of Arts councillor as part of the slate, "but Hillel believes it's the right decision."

Saperia said that over the past two years, the York Federation of Students (YFS) has been "increasingly involved in anti-Israel activities" such as providing funding for a new on-campus union newspaper called Critical Times, that he said is "full of anti-Israel rhetoric."

Hillel, as the main Jewish and Zionist student organization on campus, has now been "forced to be political," Saperia said. He said that although being political carries a risk of alienating some people, "we believe it's for the greater good of all students on campus.

> 'YFS has been involved in anti-Israel activities'

"We have a responsibility to our students."

In an e-mail to Hillel members, Saperia said that Jewish students have become "alienated and frustrated" with YFS. "History has shown that when Jewish students vote, their voice will be heard," he said. "Recent elections at Concordia University and Simon Fraser University in B.C. illustrate this."

The 31-member slate – the largest of the three slates running – is headed by Paul Cooper, a fourth-year political science student and president of the Young Zionist Partnership (YZP), a right-wing activist group he co-founded on campus in 2002.

Cooper, whose platform is Progress Not Politics, says he wants to take the YFS focus off political activity to concentrate on more general student issues such as parking, security and tuition. His plans can be found at www.progressnotpolitics.com.

"I don't see [my involvement with YZP] as a conflict at all," he said.

"I think it's important for everybody to realize that the YFS agenda is not the Hillel agenda or the YZP agenda. It's for all students," said Saperia.

In an e-mail sent on the Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights list serve, a supporter of Cooper's opponent Abdul Salick – who is also lobbying for general student concerns such as extended library hours and emergency bursaries – denounced Cooper's "York-Kahanist partnership" and its "slate of Islamophobic racists who want to shut down all political discourse on campus."

Cooper says the e-mail and similar posters are part of "a concerted effort to demonize him" as a Jewish student.

He wants to restructure YFS to make it more accountable, particularly regarding club funding. "It's not a dictatorship. It's a democratic process. All submissions [requesting funding] are voted on."

Cooper stressed the importance of preventing the type of violence that occurred at Concordia University in September 2002, when a planned lecture by former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyu was cancelled because of violent protests.

Last year, York was the site of several Mideast-related incidents, including protests against the appearance of controversial pro-Israel academic Daniel Pipes, which proceeded under heavy security. In a subsequent incident, a woman protesting the coming war in Iraq was charged with assault after a Jewish student said the protester grabbed and kicked her during the demonstration.

Cooper said the political atmosphere on campus is "not better at all" this year.

Echoes Across the Centuries

If you want to step back in time – way back – visit some of Israel's extraordinary synagogues. Many of them are rich in historic significance and still enveloped by the spirit of Judaism's religious giants.

THE RAMBAN SYNAGOGUE, JERUSALEM – When the great Torah scholar, Nachmanides (Rabbi Moshe Ben Nachman, known as the Ramban) arrived in Jerusalem in 1267, he revived this magnificent Old City synagogue, which is believed to have pre-dated the Crusader era. Through the centuries, the Ramban synagogue was also used as a mosque and a flower mill, before being restored in 1967 as a Jewish house of prayer, 700 years after the Ramban's arrival.

THE GREAT SYNAGOGUE, JERUSALEM – By historic standards, Jerusalem's Great Synagogue on downtown King George Street is just a baby. But what the Great Synagogue lacks in age, it makes up in grandeur. The shul, built in 1982, with a façade in the form of the Ten Commandments, is vast and ornate. It's a popular prayer location for North American tourists who are often treated to services led by some of the world's foremost cantors.

THE YOSEF CARO SYNAGOGUE, SAFED – This synagogue, in a city with such a rich mystic history, was reportedly the study hall of Rabbi Yosef Caro, author of the Shulchan Aruch, one of the most important guidebooks to Jewish law. This is a restored building. The original structure was destroyed in an 1837 earthquake. And while in Tzfat (Hebrew for Safed), don't bypass the Ari Synagogue, where Rabbi Isaac Luria, the famous philosopher of Jewish mysticism once worshipped.

THE BAR'AM SYNAGOGUE – Although the Purim Megilla recounts in triumphant detail the heroism of Queen Esther, it does not record her death or where she was buried. But some say she was buried in Bar'am near Israel's northern border with Lebanon. In Talmudic times, the scroll of Esther was read at the location believed to be her grave. And here in Bar'am, which is now a national park, the spectacular ruins remain of a proud ancient synagogue.

Fight the ‘new anti-Semitism,’ journalist tells students

By NATALIE RUSKIN
Special to The CJN

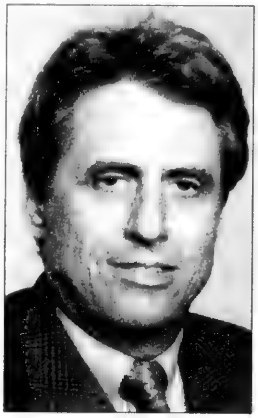
Jews have been too timid in their response to the worldwide wave of “new anti-Semitism,” journalist Martin Himel told a small group last week at Ryerson University.

The discussion, “Anti-Semitism and Anti-Israel in the Media: A Journalist’s Perspective,” was sponsored by Hillel at Ryerson.

“It drives me a little crazy when Jews won’t defend themselves against anti-Semitism,” said Himel, a Global News foreign correspondent and producer of the documentary Confrontation at Concordia.

“Whatever the situation, you’ve got to decide from within yourself how you feel and stand your ground somewhere,” Himel said, responding to concerns of Ryerson students who said they have experienced anti-Semitism on campus.

Himel’s documentary focuses on an incident in September 2002 at Concordia University in Montreal, when violence by pro-Palestinian demonstrators forced the cancellation of a speech on campus by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.



Martin Himel

A few months later, Hillel had its club status and funding revoked by the then-pro-Palestinian Concordia Student Union (CSU) over pamphlets on a Hillel table publicizing a program for foreigners who want to volunteer with the Israel Defence Forces. Hillel was subsequently reinstated and is suing the CSU.

The struggle on campus between the Concordia Student Union and Hillel has been about free speech and racism, Himel said.

As hate crimes and violence against Jews continue worldwide, and as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the war in Iraq continue, a “new anti-Semitism” has emerged that hides behind criticism of Israel, he said.

In the years leading up to and during World War II, Himel said, there was a climate of anti-Semitism and Jews were accused of instigating the war.

“[Today,] the message is clear…the United States and Israel are in a love affair and the whole war [in Iraq] is a Jewish plot for money,” Himel said.

Himel said this sentiment is captured in his documentary by an anti-Semitic poster at the front of an anti-war protest march. On it, a sexy American woman is seen masturbating a Jewish caricature with a hooked nose and a devious facial expression. Spewing out of the Jewish caricature’s sex organ are dollar signs.

“The poster was one of classic anti-Semitism,” Himel said.

He said he was shocked when his documentary was called “inflammatory” for including the poster in his film.

“The image of the stereotypical Jew was already out there, being paraded at the front lines of a protest, so how could it be inflammatory to include something that was already seen by 100,000 protesters?” Himel asked.

Several times in his talk, Himel referred to the violence at Concordia as an example of how a small incident can lead to events spiralling out of control.

“A violent riot resulted because agitated students weren’t restrained at first,” Himel said.

“Once a weakness was found in Concordia security, the student union thought, ‘Hey, we can get away with this,’ and they went full force.”

Despite being concerned that Jews are too “insecure, timid, and self-conscious,” Himel said that “being self-critical is a strength.”

He contrasted Judaism’s self-analysis and reflection to the absolutist attitude in Hamas leaders he has met.

“They say exactly what they think,” Himel said. “They do not believe in a two-state solution for Israel. They believe the region should remain an Islamic region of the world and anyone who doesn’t subscribe to this is their enemy.”

He advised those in attendance to “decide from within yourself where you stand” because “others will sense your weakness and insecurity if you are unsure about how you will respond to anti-Semitism.”

BBC admits bias by naming new Middle East watchdog

According to Reports
By
PAUL MICHAELS

The British Broadcasting Corporation's recent appointment of veteran journalist Malcolm Balen as a "senior editorial advisor" to oversee its Mideast coverage – amid mounting allegations of anti-Israel bias – has caused a stir both in Britain and abroad.

Tom Leonard, writing about the move in Britain's Daily Telegraph on Nov. 11 (reprinted in the National Post on Nov. 12), said relations between the BBC and Israel "hit a low point this summer" when the BBC aired a controversial documentary on Israel's non-conventional weapons.

After the BBC showed this terribly skewed film, Israel froze all contact with the broadcaster's staff both inside and outside the country. It accused the BBC of siding with the Palestinians, citing, among other incidents, a Gaza-based BBC correspondent who, at a Hamas rally in 2001, openly declared his allegiance – and that of other journalists – to the Palestinian cause. Israel even alleged that the BBC promoted anti-Semitic attitudes through its coverage.

In the past, the BBC had always maintained that its coverage of Israel is fair and balanced, so the decision to investigate charges of systemic bias can be seen as an admission that the corporation's longstanding defence of impartiality may no longer be sustainable. A less charitable assessment might be that such a defence has been recognized internally to be fiction.

Balen's work will no doubt be carefully watched by other media organizations, especially the CBC, which has faced similar charges of anti-Israel bias, and which carries the BBC World Service daily on its Newsworld cable channel.

Over the past several months, there has been some improvement in various aspects of the CBC's own coverage of Israel in both radio and television news. And on Nov. 7, the corporation's own satiric program, This Hour has 22 Minutes, took on the charges of anti-Israel bias in a surprisingly biting parody of the Newsworld debate show Counterspin.

Like the CBC in Canada, the BBC "has been the dominant cultural institution [in Britain] since the Second World War…[which] people look to uphold the country's values," one of its former chief executives noted recently (New York Times, Sept. 25).

But the BBC's ability to report the news with fairness – especially when it comes to the Middle East – has been placed in serious doubt. Not only has it shown a decidedly pro-Palestinian bent, but the corporation also landed in hot water with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who earlier this year accused the BBC of promoting the false allegation that his government had "sexed up" the dossier it gave Parliament to justify its attack on Iraq.

In its July 24 lead editorial, "Blair, the BBC and the war," the Economist wrote: "And it must be admitted that the government had reason to be annoyed with the rest of the corporation's reporting on its policy towards Iraq… [T]he people who work in its news and current-affairs departments mostly share a soft-left world-view: instinctive statism, cordial anti-capitalism, and bien-pensant liberal internationalism. Its reporters' prejudices, allied to the modern preference in broadcast news for… [opinion] over facts, yielded a generally pessimistic account of British and American actions before, during and after the war."

Indeed, the BBC's decision to investigate its coverage of Israel confirms the Economist's assessment.

'Pushke bandit' arrested

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Following a city-wide manhunt, Toronto police have arrested a man accused of breaking into several synagogues and Jewish-owned businesses on Bathurst Street in recent weeks.

Dubbed "the collection box bandit," the man targeted charity boxes containing small amounts of cash. There's no indication he was interested in any ceremonial or religious objects, police say.

"In most cases, he would target collection boxes – pushkes," Toronto Police Sgt. Lino Murarotto of 32 Division told The CJN. "He also took cash he found in desk drawers. But there was no defacing or desecrations."

Police and Canadian Jewish Congress agree the crimes were not motivated by hate but to fuel a drug habit.

Murarotto said the accused is a homeless drug addict who was living out of his car.

"It was frustrating because he was mobile. He covered a lot of territory, from Bayview and Steeles, to Bathurst and Lawrence."

Alleged thief targeted collection boxes

The man broke into as many as a dozen synagogues along the Bathurst Street corridor, as far north as Thornhill. According to CJC, at one of them, he entered the main sanctuary and opened the doors to the aron kodesh, but took nothing.

"In some cases, he didn't get anything. We knew we were dealing with a transient type of criminal," Murarotto said.

He said the accused never struck at the same place twice.

The incidents date back to early October, said CJC's Len Rudner.

Rudner commended the police for devoting energy to the case "at a time their resources are spread very thin. It was very comforting to know they paid attention and put manpower on it."

None of the stolen funds have been recovered.

Barry Parks, 51, of no fixed address, faces 17 counts of breaking and entering and attempted breaking and entering, and one count of possession of burglary tools. More charges are expected.

Parks remains in custody pending a bail hearing.

Lost composer's work comes alive at Dignity Day

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — The emotion was evident in the face and hands of cellist Shimon Walt as he played Reinhard Oppel's Cello Sonata.

Performing at Halifax's Pier 21 Nov. 9 on the 65th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass – known here as Dignity Day – Walt was debuting the sonata, which was composed in 1903 but never played, and buried for decades during and after World War II.

Music of Jewish composer and violinist Paul Kletzki was also performed for the first time in the concert supported by the Atlantic Jewish Council; Shaar Shalom Synagogue, which is celebrating its 50th annversary year; and the St. Cecilia Concert series, now in its 15th year.

Oppel, a non-Jewish composer, buried his music in a stout trunk near Halle in the late 1930s, a broken man after losing his status in Germany because of his outspoken and fierce opposition to Hitler. He died of a heart attack in 1941. His son Kurt, a German minister who came from Frankfurt to attend the concert, discovered the trunk containing scores and manuscripts of his father's music at his old homestead in 1990.

"Playing this had a special feeling for me," said Walt, a longtime member of Symphony Nova Scotia, who lost many close family members in the Holocaust.

"The more I got into reading and playing Oppel's music, the more I felt the impact of it being written 100 years ago and then he was forced to get rid of it. My job was to bring it back to life. I felt ownership of it."

It "felt good that the first person who ever played this piece was me," Walt said.

"New composers can tell you what they are thinking, what they want to express. But with Oppel's work, there is no one to ask, no one remembers. You look at the dots on the page and try to figure out what was in the composer's heart when he wrote it. When I spoke with Kurt Oppel afterwards, he was very pleased that we expressed what was in his father's heart."

Timothy Jackson, formerly of Halifax, and now an associate professor of music theory at University of North Texas, in Denton, resurrected the music for the concert. He knew of Oppel through his studies of music theorist Heinrich Schenker, an admirer of Oppel's work.

Jackson also discovered Kletzki conducted the Dallas Symphony in 1960 and conducted the University of North Texas Choir in 1961.

Kletzki fled to Italy in 1933, and later lived in Russia, Israel and the United States. The composer-conductor left a buried chest of his music in Milan, which was later uncovered and sent to his widow who opened it after his death in 1973.

In a pre-concert address, Jackson said he is trying to get the music played so people know what it sounds like.

"There are probably many more works out there, buried, unknown," he said. "I'm going to dig up what I can."

The Blue Engine String Quartet, four female members of Symphony Nova Scotia, performed Kletzki's String Quartet in A minor, composed in 1923, and Oppel's String Quartet No. 2 in D minor (1919). Soprano Sung Ha Shin-Bouey, accompanied by pianist Peter Allen, sang Lieder by Oppel and Carlo Taube's only existing known work, Ein Judisches Kind.

Peggy Walt, co-chair of the Shaar Shalom's anniversary celebrations and host of the evening, said the concert "deserved to have people come out. We had more than 400 people, better than most St. Cecilia Series audiences, and they loved the music. Kurt Oppel told me later his father would have been astonished to have so many people hear his music."

Kristallnacht: 'the shattering of illusions'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The sounds of broken glass can still be heard the world over and it is disingenuous and hypocritical for people to sympathize with Jewish Holocaust victims while in the same breath excoriating Israel, Rabbi Reuben Poupko said at the annual Kristallnacht commemoration.

"Israel is the new Jew," he said. "It used to be 'Jews to Palestine.' Now it's 'Jews out of Palestine. Don't be here. Don't be there. Don't be.'"

Rabbi Poupko, of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron, was speaking to some 350 people at the Gelber Conference Centre, the largest crowd ever to attend the ceremony, which this year marked 65 years since the "Night of Broken Glass," Nov. 9-10, 1938, when Nazi storm troopers were directed to assail the Jews of Germany and Austria, their properties and institutions.

The toll included 91 Jews murdered, 1,400 synagogues ransacked and 200 others burned, with the Torah scrolls and prayer books inside.

Thirty thousand Jews were shipped to concentration camps. Thousands of Jewish businesses and homes were destroyed. Hundreds of Jews were brutally attacked.

Survivor Charlotte Lintzel, who works as a docent at the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC), which organized the evening, noted that the magnificent Neue Synagoge in Berlin was spared destruction only because of the courageous intervention of the city's police chief. The synagogue was desecrated and set ablaze, but the fire brigade was summoned and kept the synagogue from being destroyed.

The pretext for the first German government-sanctioned progrom was the shooting death of a German Embassy official in Paris by a Jewish boy.

Marc Attali, Israel's consul general in Montreal, said the fight against anti-Semitism and the perseverance of the Jewish people and the State of Israel bear testimony to Jewish strength and the Jewish people's determination to prevail over the forces of intolerance and hate.

"We are the product of what we've endured," Attali said. "This struggle is our victory."

The ceremony included readings and musical interludes, recitation of the Kaddish by survivor Eugene Flegg, and tehillim (psalms) and a memorial prayer recited by Beth Israel Beth Aaron cantor Moishe Shur.

Six memorial candles, each representing one million Holocaust victims, were lit by survivors Sigi Katz, Suzanne and Leon Klag and Lily Strauss; B'nai Brith's Amos Sochaczevski; Estie Kleinfeld, daughter of a survivor; and MHMC founding president Steven Cummings.

Among the dignitaries attending were former Quebec premier Bernard Landry, and consuls general Hubert Ziegler of Germany and Ulrike Botens of Austria.

Kingston elects its first-ever Jewish mayor

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Harvey Rosen agrees with the tongue-in-cheek suggestion that perhaps being Kingston's first Jewish mayor is a step down from being president of his synagogue.

"You could say that," chuckles Rosen on the telephone from Kingston, which recently elected the 54-year-old lawyer and lifelong resident as mayor in a landslide. "After all, being president of a synagogue is very important."

Perhaps, but Rosen will soon step down as president of the Orthodox Beth Israel Congregation to take the city's reins, handed to him in the Nov. 10 municipal elections by a healthy 23,179 votes to just 4,550 for incumbent Isabel Turner – the biggest margin of victory in Kingston in recent memory.

It was a stunning win for Rosen, who is likely now Ontario's only Jewish mayor after Mel Lastman's departure in Toronto, and it surprised even him.

"My campaign wasn't surprised, but I was. I thought I'd been getting filtered information from them," he told The CJN. "They were telling me I had a huge amount of support."

His team was right. Rosen's win represented just the second time in 45 years that an incumbent Kingston mayor seeking re-election was turfed.

Harvey Rosen

Ed Smith, another member of Kingston's Jewish community, was also elected as a new city councillor.

In his election night victory speech, Rosen said he was "overwhelmed." He said his father "would be the proudest man in the community at this moment."

Rosen's father, the late Harry Rosen (no relation to the clothier of the same name), was born in Kingston, and his mother, Sylvia, was born in Montreal and still lives in Kingston.

The mayor-elect, who will be sworn in Dec. 2, traces his family's roots to the Lithuanian shtetl of Anyksciai, which was all but wiped off the map during World War II.

A longtime leader in Kingston's 200-family Jewish community, Rosen points out that he's a Young Judea alumnus, having attended Camps Shalom and Biluim.

Members of Kingston's only other synagogue, the Reform Temple Iyr Ha-Melech, worship at Queen's University.

Rosen closed his law practice in 2000 and became vice-president of Rosen Corp. Ltd., a family-owned real estate development firm. The company, which once included Rosen Fuels, was started by his father. The fuel concern is now run by Rosen's sister Merle Koven and her husband Phil Koven.

Rosen has said he expects few conflicts between his public and private roles and that he will be able to handle both positions. The $65,000-a-year position as mayor is widely regarded as part-time, but Rosen has said he will devote most of his energies to the job.

Rosen attributed his win to the fact residents "were tired of studies and reports, and wanted concrete action. The [previous] mayor had touted certain accomplishments that were completed under her term, but were actually started years before."

Like mayors of all cities, big and small, he faces crushing financial problems. Ontario municipalities, he points out, are legally enjoined from incurring deficits, but that hasn't stopped Kingston, which has a population of 113,000, from running up a $10-million operating budget "shortfall" this fiscal year, for the fourth consecutive year. Council has had to borrow $2.6 million from the city's reserve funds to keep tax increases to a minimum.

A "lightning rod" issue, Rosen points, has been the local arena/community centre, which is falling apart. "That really galvanized the electorate," he said.

Among his more immediate priorities is to "corral" a highly fractious council and bring about some control.

"Council meetings are broadcast on the local cable channel. It's referred to locally as 'the Gong Show.' I want to bring some order and leadership to council."

Rosen faces a list of 200 projects. He hopes to shore up aging infrastructure without disturbing the city's A-1 credit rating.

He also said he's not afraid to review all services and investigate privatizing some of them if there is a benefit to the taxpayer.

Rosen has two sons, Zachary and Tyler, who attend the University of Western Ontario. A divorcé, he's engaged to Sharon Monson of Sydney, Australia.

Asked whether being Jewish was a stumbling block in his bid, Rosen chuckles again and says, "The voters elected me by a very large margin, so I guess it wasn't."

Security cameras captured one of Istanbul bombers: report

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ISTANBUL — Security cameras captured on video one of the suicide bombers who carried out the devastating attacks on two Istanbul synagogues this past weekend that killed 24 people and injured more than 300.

Interior Minister Abdulkdir Aksu was quoted on Monday as saying one of the bombers of the Neve Shalom synagogue could be discerned on security film shot an instant before the blast Saturday morning.

"But it's not clear. We're trying to clarify and make an identification," he told Turkey's Vatan newspaper.

Turkish officials were investigating claims that the Al Qaeda terrorist network was responsible for the car bombings at Neve Shalom and Beit Israel, Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said Sunday.

Two Arabic-language newspapers received separate statements Sunday claiming Osama bin Laden's group was responsible for the attacks.

"Our security teams, our intelligence services have to work to determine the extent of truth of the claims," Erdogan said.

Israeli security sources said it appears increasingly likely the attack was carried out by two suicide bombers and that Al Qaeda was indeed behind the blasts in some way.

Representatives of Israel's security forces are currently in Turkey to help with the investigation.

The Al Qaeda claim of responsibility came from a message that read the attacks were carried out by "the Abu Hafez Masri Brigades."

Abu Hafez Masri was a close associate of bin Laden and one of his senior aides who was killed in a U.S. assault during the war in Afghanistan. The same group has claimed responsibility for the attacks on an Arkia jet and the Paradise Hotel in Mombasa, Kenya, last year, as well as the strike on the Marriott Hotel in Jakarta a few months ago.

The claim also read that the attacks on the synagogues were carried out after the organization learned that "five Mossad agents" were there, and that the bombings were "a gift to Jerusalem."

Meanwhile, a senior political source who arrived in Istanbul on Sunday said officials in both Israel and Turkey had received intelligence warnings of plans by terror groups to carry out attacks against Jewish targets in Turkey.

The source told Ha'aretz that in recent weeks, Turkish authorities and Jewish community leaders had received forewarning of intentions of terror groups to mount attacks against Jewish targets in the country and that similar information had reached the security services in Israel, including the Mossad.

But defence establishment sources again denied Sunday that the Mossad had relayed a warning to the Turkish authorities regarding possible attacks on synagogues.

Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, who was in Turkey on Sunday, refused to comment on the security aspects of the terror attacks, but did not deny that the defence establishment had received warnings regarding possible attacks on Jewish targets there.

24 killed in terrorist attacks

Nevertheless, Shalom said, "there are warnings all the time regarding various Jewish targets around the world."

The foreign minister also said many Israeli consulates around the world had upped their level of alert immediately upon hearing of the Istanbul attacks.

"There is an orderly procedure according to which all the consulates go over to a state of high alert under such circumstances," he said.

Members of Turkey's Jewish community knew terror groups were planning attacks, and security around Jewish installations was recently boosted. But no one expected strikes of this magnitude.

The Istanbul police's initial investigation has revealed that the two terrorists drove two commercial vehicles through the city's narrow streets until they reached the two synagogues, detonating their explosives approximately a minute apart. An examination of the video footage captured by five security cameras at the synagogues showed that each of the vehicles had forged license plates.

Forensic tests were carried out on the remains of the explosives in an effort to trace their origins. The Turkish police reported that the devices contained some 400 kilograms of explosives each.

The Turks do not believe local elements were involved in the attacks, noting that Turkish groups are not interested in or capable of carrying out such large strikes in Turkey's commercial capital.

The first explosion occured at 9:30 Saturday morning near the main entrance of the city's central synagogue, Neve Shalom.

The second took place a few minutes later at the back side of Beit Israel Synagogue, in Istanbul's Sisli neighbourhood, about three miles away.

The blasts were heard from miles away and left the streets surrounding the synagogues littered with shards of broken glass. An usher working in Neve Shalom said it was filled with close to 400 people celebrating a bar mitzvah.

"We were in the middle of reading the Torah when we felt a big explosion. Everybody ran out," said the usher, who asked not to be named.

Another congregant standing atop the rubble looked out on the scene of destruction, holding a handkerchief to his face to keep out the strong smell of ammonia that filled the air after the explosion.

"What kind of peaceful Sabbath is this?" he asked.

In front of Neve Shalom, a deep crater marked the spot where Turkish officials said the small, explosives-packed truck blew up. A blackened axle was all that remained of the vehicle.

The stone and wrought-iron facade of the synagogue was completely destroyed, and the foyer was filled with a tangle of twisted metal and shattered glass.

The synagogue is located on a narrow street in one of Istanbul's most historic districts, an area filled with small shops selling lamps and chandeliers.

The explosion devastated the entire street, shattering store windows and leaving some balconies on the verge of collapse.

"I heard the explosion. I thought it was an earthquake. From my front terrace I saw people coming out of the synagogue, some of them covered in blood," said Gulen Guler, who lives in a building a few doors down from the synagogue. "We could see bodies lying in the street and windows smashed everywhere."

Neve Shalom's sanctuary is set off from the street, so the number of injured was relatively low and the damage was limited to the entrance. Most of the day's injured came from the Beit Israel synagogue, which was filled with about 300 people, many of them there to celebrate the recent renovation of a smaller sanctuary in the back of the synagogue, close to where the car bomb exploded.

Among those killed at Beit Israel were a woman in her 80s and her 8-year-old granddaughter. At Neve Shalom, the victims included a woman who was four months pregnant.

Turkey's chief rabbi, Isak Haleva, and Ben Zion Pinto, president of the 20,000-member Turkish Jewish community, were at Beit Israel when the bombing occurred. Neither was injured.

"I was praying when suddenly there was an explosion under us and all the windows blew open and I was left standing there in shock in the middle of heavy smoke," Rabbi Haleva said.

Neve Shalom, which means "Oasis of Peace" in Hebrew, was the target of an attack in 1986, when gunmen believed to be Palestinians from the Abu Nidal terrorist group burst into the shul, killing 22.

Canadian solidarity mission salutes Israel

The evening, which was organized by the United Israel Appeal of Canada, began with a tour of the base and a dinner with Israeli pilots, who talked about their day-to-day life and showed mission members around a display of aircraft.

While the aim was ostensibly to explain the Israel Defence Force's activity to representatives of Canadian Jewry, Orly Gal of the IDF Spokesman's office said the encounter also had a strong impact on the pilots.

"They were touched that so many people came out at such a time," Gal said.

Later, the Canadians joined 700 soldiers from the base in a hangar decorated in camouflage colours and Canadian red-and-white balloons for a speech by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who returned to the same theme.

Solidarity missions, he said, were "more important now than ever."

He urged the Canadian members of the audience to increase their advocacy work for Israel.

"Israel, the homeland of the Jewish people, is not just an Israeli project. It is a worldwide project of all the Jewish people," he said. "

"Although you come from Canada, you have stake in Israel and it is your responsibility no less than it is ours. If Israel, God forbid, should be weakened, the Jews will not be able to live the life that you are living now."

He also urged mission members, who were all to attend the United Jewish Communities' General Assembly (GA) in Jerusalem later in the trip, to make aliyah.

"We continue to develop our most important resource, the Jewish people, and you have to help," he said.

The evening concluded with a musical performance by Israeli superstar Eyal Golan, who was joined on stage by many of the soldiers, some of them waving Canadian flags.

Participants said the event had a strong impact on them.

"It's powerful being here as part of this group," said Barb Peltz, a real estate agent from Toronto. "Just look at the faces. You can feel the energy."

Added Dov Altman, a Torontonian on his second mission, "Jaws are dropping, and the mission hasn't even properly begun. Where else can you be in a room with friends from all over Canada, see the prime minister, and speak to the young boys and girls defending us? My only regret is that there aren't more of us here to see it."

Still, organizers noted that Toronto has produced more missions to Israel than any other city in the world in the last three years, averaging one a month and totalling almost 2,500 people.

They credit the city's strong educational system and leadership.

According to Goldhar, participants have come from a true cross-section of the Jewish community and recruitment has actually become easier as the situation worsened in Israel.

"The worse things get here, the stronger the need to show affiliation," he said.

This mission, however, promises to stand out.

"Sometimes quality counts more than quantity," said Jack Chisvin, past president of the federation and one of the delegates. "In this case, quantity is more important."

Speaking the next day in Jerusalem to Canadian Zionists in town for the GA, Sharon said anger over Israel's crackdowns against Palestinians is often motivated by anti-Semitism.

Sharon said those who deny Israel's right to self-defence deny its "birthright to exist." He added, "Regrettably, we see this phenomenon among many nations in the world community, and I would say that this is a new form of anti-Semitism."

Israel builds a flourishing relationship with China

Israel's motives were equally clear. Apart from regarding China as an astonishingly promising export market, Israel calculated that friendship with China would diminish its political isolation.

Eyal Propper, the deputy head of mission at Israel's beautifully designed, newly built white polished stone embassy in Beijing, said that Israel formed a wide variety of mutually beneficial ties with China in the first nine years of their relationship.

"It was the golden age. Relations moved quickly after 1992. We opened gates."

Trade boomed after Yitzhak Rabin, then Israel's prime minister, paid an official visit to China in 1993. He was the first of many Israeli dignitaries who have since appeared in Beijing.

"Israel can't ignore the Chinese market," said Propper. "It has huge potential. It's important for Israel to be in the picture."

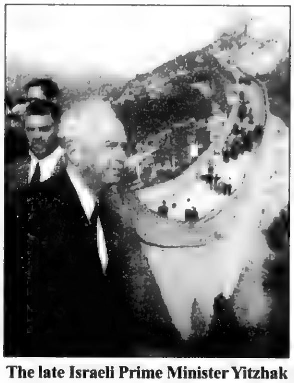
Today, Israeli exports to China range from high-tech medical and telecommunications equipment to diamonds and potassium.

According to a U.S. congressional panel, Israel also supplies China with military technology, from radar systems and drones to flight simulators. The Jamestown Foundation, an American think tank, claims that Israel helped the Chinese develop the Chengdu multipurpose fighter jet with technology borrowed from the scrapped Lavi project.

By all accounts, Israel ranks second only to Russia as a supplier of weaponry and sophisticated military technology to China.

Israel, understandably, plays down such sales. Dan Catarivas, a senior Israeli diplomat and old China hand who was passing through Beijing en route to Europe, denied that Israel is a big player in the Chinese arms trade. "If only half the rumours were true, Israel's arms industry would be in much better shape," he said.

But Catarivas acknowledged that China – an arms supplier to the Arab world and Iran – tapped into Israeli military expertise prior to 1992.



The late Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin at the Great Wall of China in 1993.

"There were contacts and, probably, deals," he said. "But the magnitude was exaggerated."

After Chinese President Jiang Zemin's state visit to Israel in 2000, Israel agreed to sell the Phalcon early warning radar system to China. The $250 million (US) deal was called off when the United States, in deference to Taiwan, protested. China was furious and demanded compensation. Israel complied, but the ill-starred Phalcon affair set back Sino-Israeli relations.

But this episode did not dampen Israel's overall commercial links with Beijing. Its exports to China, excluding Hong Kong, reached $400 million (US) last year. It is unclear whether this figure included military equipment and technology.

By contrast, China exported $800 million worth of products, from textiles to furniture, to Israel.

Nor did the fallout of the Phalcon affair harm Israel's agricultural aid program in China. Israel maintains several experimental farms in the Chinese countryside.

Cultural relations are flourishing as well. Two years ago, China sent 100 of its famous, 2,000-year-old terra cotta warriors to the Israel Museum in Jerusalem. And since 1992, more than 60 Israeli books have been translated into Chinese.

A small number of Israeli university students study in China, but almost 1,000 Chinese students are enrolled in Israeli institutions, concentrating on technological and agricultural subjects.

Thousands of Israelis visit China annually, flying to Beijing on El Al's weekly flight. Yet Air China has no service to Israel, and Israel attracts very few Chinese tourists, probably because China has yet to sign an accord with Israel permitting Chinese tour groups.

China, which has long called for a Palestinian state, supported the Oslo peace process and backs the road map peace plan. In multilateral forums, such as the United Nations, it consistently votes against Israel.

"We want to see a more balanced Chinese policy," said Propper. "China should understand it can't be one-sided and be an important and reliable partner in the Middle East."

China's special Mideast envoy, Wang Shijie, has visited the region three times since his appointment last year. On his last visit three weeks ago, he said his mission is "to ease tensions and promote peace talks."

The current Palestinian intifadah has affected bilateral relations, Propper said, adding that China is reluctant to nurture better relations with Israel while the violence rages.

One Israeli diplomat who preferred to remain anonymous said he is under the impression China wants to keep its relationship with Israel low-key. Beijing has stopped sending senior delegations to Israel since Israel's announcement that it will boycott foreign leaders who meet with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, the diplomat said.

Nevertheless, six Chinese correspondents are stationed in Israel and China's media coverage of Israel is quite comprehensive.

"Not a day goes by when Israel is not in the news," marvelled an Israeli diplomat. "It seems as if every Chinese person knows [Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon's name."

The Week in Israel

Nov. 10

- The Islamic Jihad suicide bomber who blew up Haifa's Maxim's restaurant last month ate there before the attack. The detail came out as a court indicted an Israeli Arab who drove the bomber to Maxim's.

Nov. 11

- Israel refused to permanently hire Danny Seaman, acting head of the Government Press Office since the intifadah began in 2000, even though he was the only applicant for the job. He was reportedly rejected because of rocky relations with some foreign journalists.
- Israel's security fence to stop attacks from the West Bank would disrupt the lives of 600,000 Palestinians and put 15 per cent of the territory on Israel's side, a UN report said.

Nov 12

- Israel has harmed its credibility by not honouring its road map peace plan commitments, a leaked Foreign Ministry memo says. "Not only have we not evacuated illegal [settler] outposts… we are working… to whitewash them and build more," says the memo, which was prepared to brief Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Israeli PR efforts.
- Ami Ayalon, ex-head of the Shin Bet security service, wrote leading Likud party members, urging them to accept a peace plan he formulated with Palestinian academic Sari Nusseibeh, and saying the Likud should retain power since the left lacks the clout to uproot settlements.

Nov. 13

- A court convicted a Qalqilyah man who drove a suicide bomber to Tel Aviv's Dolphinarium disco in June 2001. The attack killed 21 people.

Nov. 14

- About 35 ships were delayed as 2,000 port workers resumed a strike in Haifa and Ashdod. It began after a Greek ship docked at Israel's first private port in violation of a deal with the government, unions said.

Make aliyah, Sharon urges GA delegates

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

JERUSALEM — Israel has decided to place aliyah from the West high on its agenda. That was the clear message in Jerusalem Sunday night at the opening ceremonies of the 72nd General Assembly (GA) of the United Jewish Communities (UJC).

Speaking to some 6,000 people in Binyanei Ha'uma, Jerusalem's expansive convention centre on the hills overlooking the western approaches to the capital, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said his government is determined "to bring thousands of olim [new immigrants] from the United States and Canada."

Sharon urged the audience to consider making aliyah and to encourage their friends to visit Israel. Using language that evoked slain American civil rights activist Martin Luther King Jr., he said, "I have a dream that every Jew in the world will visit Jerusalem, that every young Jew in the world will live in Israel at least for one year during his or her lifetime."

Sharon's message was similar to that of President Moshe Katsav, who addressed the audience earlier in the evening. Katsav said that "aliyah should be on the agenda of every Jew abroad.

"A large aliyah from the West would mark a turning point for Israel. The peace process would proceed faster if there were 1,000,000 more Jews from the West living in Israel."

Jewish Agency chairman Sallai Meridor later echoed the sentiment, saying that "nothing was more important for Israel than aliyah."

Sharon and Katsav also spoke about the terrorist car bombings the previous day at two Istanbul synagogues.

After conveying Israel's condolences to the people of Turkey, whose ambassador to Israel was in attendance, Katsav said, "There is a direct connection between terrorism and anti-Semitism. But there is no conflict between Judaism and Islam. Judaism, Christianity and Islam should fight together against terrorism and bloodshed."

The loudest and most sustained applause of the evening came when Sharon spoke about the resilience of the Jewish people. "Our enemies have yet to understand that the Jewish people cannot, and will never, be broken."

But not all of Sharon's remarks were well-received. Twice at the outset of his speech he was interrupted by heckling from supporters of convicted spy Jonathan Pollard, an American who has served 18 years of a life sentence in a U.S. prison for spying for Israel.

His supporters shouted at Sharon to "bring him [Pollard] home." But Sharon seemed less perturbed by the hecklers than the thousands in the audience who angrily shouted down the protesters.

One heckler was forcefully ejected by security personnel.

Outside, hundreds of pro-Pollard protesters waved Israeli flags while holding signs that read "Pollard =Dreyfus" and chanting "free Pollard."

They were hoping to gain attention from GA delegates and said UJC leaders have ignored Pollard's case for too long.

"I am outraged that there is a group of American Jews here with so much influence, who come as if they are supporting Israel, and then don't even address Pollard," U.S.-born Karen Sinai, an activist in Free Pollard in Israel, said of the GA delegates.

"We don't want their money, so they should just stay out."

The annual GA brings together lay and professional leaders and Jewish community activists from across North America. Some 4,300 North Americans from more than 550 communities – including 500 Canadians – and 2,000 Israelis took part this year. It was the second time the GA has been held in Jerusalem, the first being five years ago to mark Israel's 50th anniversary.

The four-day event brought together delegates for an agenda heavy with workshops, lectures, field trips and plenary meetings. Among the highlights were scheduled to be a special tribute to the Israel Defence Forces and a "Salute to the City of Jerusalem" in which thousands of delegates were to march from the convention centre more than a mile into the heart of downtown Jerusalem.

Most of the Canadian contingent arrived in Israel nearly a week before the GA to take part in various missions.

For David Newman of Toronto, it was his first visit to Israel. "This was a total rejuvenation to my spirit," he told The CJN. "One of the most moving moments for me happened when an Israeli came up to me and said this was the greatest sight for him to see, simply so many Jews visiting Israel.

"'The fact that you're here,' he said to me, 'was the greatest thing we could ask for.'"

David Baker, of Ottawa, who was recognized at the GA with a 2003 Young Leadership Award, described the opening ceremonies and travelling in Israel as "truly a one-of-a-kind experience." Baker, who met his wife Marla, on a mission to Israel three years ago, marvelled at how struck he was once again by the "splendour and the beauty of the city of Jerusalem."

Janice Landy, chair of the National Council of Jewish Women Canada, Toronto section, was in Israel with a group of nearly 30 NCJW colleagues.

"I love it here," she said. "It is still one of the most exciting places on earth to visit. We've travelled all over and haven't thought anything about possible dangers."

Jacqui Vital, formerly of Ottawa, was in the audience to watch her daughter, Ayala, a member of the Mechola dance troupe that performed for the assembly.

Vital made aliyah 29 years ago and now lives in Gilo, a suburb in southern Jerusalem that came under sniper attack in the early months of the renewed Palestinian violence unleashed in 2000.

She said she "felt overwhelmed seeing all these people from arbah canfot [the four corners] of North America come to Jerusalem."

Arafat controls 8 per cent of PA budget: IMF

Impossible to trace funds, report says

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Limited

Some 8 per cent of the Palestinian Authority's budget is managed solely by PA President Yasser Arafat and much of it is not subject to transparent accounting standards, according to an official report compiled by the International Monetary Fund.

Under the heading "Economic Performance and Reforms under Conflict Conditions," the IMF document, based on data provided by the PA, describes the financial management of the PA since its establishment in 1995 and through the outbreak of the latest Palestinian intifadah in 2000.

The figures show, among other things, that some $900 million (all figures US) in PA revenues "disappeared" during the period in question and was transferred from the PA Finance Ministry to unknown destinations.

As well, the report says the 2003 budget for Arafat's office totalled $74 million, of which a sum of $34 million is listed as "transfers" that Arafat uses to pay "organizations" and "individuals," as the report puts it.

The report describes the management of Arafat's budget as follows: "The president assumes the prerogative of providing aid to various organizations and individuals. Some of them have legitimate claims, but have fallen through the safety net and have no recourse other than appealing to the president. These include students seeking scholarships abroad, patients seeking specialized medical care abroad, and people who have lost all their assets and livelihood during the conflict.

"However, other claimants and organizations are part of politically favoured networks who should not be getting such grants under any criterion," the report says.

The IMF says this raises questions and suspicions that are inconsistent with accountable and transparent public finance systems, which require that all transfers and beneficiaries be published.

"The solution is simple. The president's budget should only cover the president's staff and operational expenses. All transfers should be spun off to the respective ministries for education, health and social affairs," the IMF report says.

The document, which was distributed among the delegations that attended the IMF's annual conference in Abu Dhabi 1 1/2 months ago, does not name the recipients of the funds, but those privy to Arafat's office procedures say that some of the money goes to various associates and Fatah activists, who submit requests for Arafat's personal approval.

The donor countries and organizations that are monitoring PA reforms define "safety net" as the terms under which funds are transferred to the PA that ensure they are not used to finance terror activities or further unworthy goals. The report reveals, however, that it is impossible to keep track of the funds listed as "the president's budget."

The document calls on Arafat to reveal the names of the beneficiaries, but it does not pose an ultimatum.

The IMF report also reveals, for the first time, the official number of security personnel registered as receiving wages from the PA – 56,128, almost 20,000 more than the number agreed to in the Oslo accords.

The document criticizes the fact some of those personnel receive their wages in cash through the heads of the various security departments.

Lost 85 pounds five years ago, and has easily kept it off!

"My name is Carol Hooper. I lost 85 pounds. It was effortless! I went from a baggy XXL to a petite size six.

I was overweight nearly my entire life. Everything revolved around food. I spent the majority of my life living to eat.

Carrying an extra 85 pounds is hard work. I was always tired. I looked for excuses to stay home. I spent a lot of time in bed.

The truth is I was hiding. My weight embarrassed me. I was a spectator.

I tried everything to lose weight. Pre-packaged food, shakes, every weird diet. I counted, weighed, measured and starved.

I lost my weight once with medication. I gained it all back plus 70 pounds.

[When I finally visited Positive Changes Hypnosis], I was impressed. There was no pressure. The weight started dropping off. The last 55 pounds melted away in five short months.

I recently saw my doctor. She asked me how I lost the weight. She will be recommending Positive Changes Hypnosis to her patients.

I get compliments galore. I'm wearing a lot of my daughter's clothes. She's 15 years old. We trade back and forth. I feel young and alive. No extra baggage.

I recommend Positive Changes Hypnosis to everyone. I'm living testimony. Hypnosis works!

Anti-Semitism rising to historic levels, says ADL's Abraham Foxman

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — If Abraham Foxman's predictions are right, we currently face as grave a threat to the safety of the Jewish people as the one we faced in the 1930s – if not a greater one.

That's the case the national director of the Anti-Defamation League, a child Holocaust survivor, makes in his new book, Never Again? The Threat of the New Anti-Semitism.

In his opening address at the ADL's 90th annual meeting in New York Nov. 6, Foxman anchored today's "sobering times" in another anniversary – the 65th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

Kristallnacht, when Nazi-inspired rioters stormed the streets torching synagogues and beating Jews, is a stark reminder that anti-Semitic persecution "started with glass" and "ended with flesh," Foxman said.

Today's version primarily is hidden under the guise of anti-Zionism, he said.

Holding Israel to a double standard and questioning the Jewish right to self-determination smacks of anti-Semitism, Foxman and others argue.

Today's anti-Israel messages carry broad appeal, finding champions among both the right and left, with bigots and anti-colonialists adhering to the cause. Globalization and the Internet allow anti-Israel tirades that dehumanize Jews and delegitimize Israel to move around the world in seconds.

Foxman's book hits shelves amid two incidents that reflect his argument.

The first is last month's speech by Malaysia's then-prime minister, Mahathir Mohamad, who told the 57-nation Organization of the Islamic Conference that "Jews rule the world by proxy," and urged the Muslim world to unite to defeat the Jews.

The second development is a recent poll revealing that more Europeans – about 59 per cent – consider Israel the greatest threat to world peace than any other country. Under leaders that excuse the anti-Semitism in their midst, Europe – home to a fast-growing Muslim population – has given rise to extremist political parties and hate crimes against Jews, Foxman notes in his book.

But Never Again? also comes as the FBI prepares to release data showing a downward trend in anti-Semitic crime in the United States. The FBI reports 931 anti-Jewish incidents in 2002, down from 1,043 in 2001 and 1,119 in 2000, FBI spokesman Paul Bresson said.

Mandolin concert series opens in Toronto

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

For such a little instrument, the mandolin sure seems to be making a lot of noise.

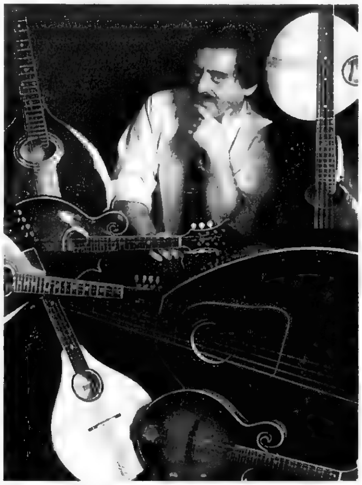
Mandolin music seems to be everywhere lately, perhaps due in part to the craze for acoustic roots and bluegrass that followed the popular film O Brother Where Art Thou.

But it's not simply twang and hillbilly music that's boosting the mandolin's popularity. The instrument is appearing in more unexpected musical contexts as well. Just last year Toronto played host to the annual convention of the Classical Mandolin Society of America (CMSA), an event which brought more than 1,200 people from all ends of North America to a hotel near Toronto airport for four days of mandomania.

One of the leading forces popularizing the mandolin in southern Ontario these days is the 40-piece Toronto Mandolin Orchestra (TMO). The TMO sponsored last fall's CMSA convention, and also puts on a number of its own concerts each year.

The mandomeisters at the TMO are now launching a project aimed at further popularizing their beloved instrument. "Mandolins of the World" is a unique new concert series that will be presented 2-3 times per year in Toronto and southern Ontario. Its aim will be to expose audiences to the many styles of music played on the mandolin and the wide variety of mandolin instruments which exist.

The mandolin is unique in that it is found in one form or another all over the world. It goes by a multitude of names and comes in many shapes and sizes. It is used in a vast range of musical styles, including classical, jazz, Latin, country, bluegrass, and just about every kind of folk and world music.



Alexander Veprinsky, conductor of the Toronto Mandolin Orchestra.

Each instalment of "Mandolins of the World" will have a specific geographic or stylistic theme.

The first edition of the series has an Eastern European theme and was presented for the first time last spring in Hamilton, with great success. This show is now being given an encore presentation in Toronto on Nov. 23 at 2pm, at the brand new Al Green Theatre of the Miles Nadal JCC (750 Spadina, at Bloor). This will be one of the first concerts in this beautiful new 288-seat venue.

The TMO headlines the show with its stirring mix of Ukrainian, Russian, and classical music. Their performance will feature soloist Ira Erokhina on the 3-string domra, a Russian variant of the mandolin.

The four-act variety show also features 25 minute sets from three other great artists: Bouzouki virtuoso Kostas Apostolakis will demonstrate that there's much more to Greece's equivalent of the mandolin than Zorba the Greek; Skitnice Tambura Ensemble will play rousing Balkan folk music on their region's version of the mandolin; and Jewish music will be performed by the quintet Beyond the Pale, a local klezmer and East European folk group.

In all there will be well over 400 strings in the house, singing and dancing with their exotic tones and seductive tremelo sounds. The audience will also receive a beautiful souvenir program with historical information about all the instruments being heard.

Future installments of MOTW will shift the thematic focus of the series, from American music (jazz, bluegrass, blues), to Latin music (choro, tango, Cuban), and much much more, including special artistic collaborations between the TMO and leading international mandolin artists.

Tickets for Mandolins of the World can be ordered directly from the Shevchenko Musical Ensemble by calling 416-533-2725. For more information call the Shevchenko Ensemble office or visit www.geocities.com/shevchenko1951/motw2.html.

A wondrously involving exhibiton

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Government closure of numerous hospitals across Canada germinated a seed in the fertile mind of Vera Frenkel that led to "The Institute: Or, What We Do For Love," an uncommon installation featured at The Justina M. Barnicke Gallery in Hart House at the University of Toronto.

A student of master printmaker Albert Dumnouchel at Montreal's École des Beaux Arts, Frenkel has turned increasingly to media arts in scrutinizing the issues that move her, relying on the installation practice as a means of entry.

Outraged at the forced merger of some hospitals and the elimination of others, and concurrently dismayed by funding cutbacks to the arts, Frenkel's novel response was to create within the gallery a mythical hospital space designated as a retirement home for artists – painters, sculptors, writers, musicians. Here they would live under a government scheme to retrain as caregivers, unemployed cultural bureaucrats, government personnel responsible for administering arts programs who would, in an ironic twist, become the gardeners, chefs and housekeepers for the residents.

This project entailed some two years of intensive planning, research and artistic endeavour by Frenkel plus contributions from three generations of artists, writers, civil servants and intellectuals. Combined with Web site links, The Institute presents a wondrously involving exhibition.

Each of Frenkel's contributors, including Justina M. Barnicke director Judi Schwartz, was asked to complete a detailed questionnaire to fashion a persona who would come to "life" on Internet screens as a retirement home resident or caregiver and interact with visitors as they surf the Net in the gallery. Also on the Net will be related pronouncements by government officials. Frenkel has Sheila Copps opening the first Institute.

Hospital closures planted a seed in Vera Frenkel's mind. [Vince Talotta photo]

Enhancing the scenario at the Hart House installation will be Frenkel's digital prints on paper and canvas. Original music will be heard off-line.

Czech-born, Toronto-based Frenkel was awarded the Canada Council Molson Prize in 1989, the Gershon Iskowitz Prize in 1994 and the Bell Canada Award in 2001. She lectures widely and is the recipient of many honours in countries throughout the world.

The Institute: Or, What We Do For Love continues until Dec. 18. For information, phone 416-978-8398 or visit www.utoronto.ca/gallery.

Exhibit offers lively look at Toronto’s garment industry

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Through a series of colourful panels, photographs, display cases, clothing racks, and stand-alone artifacts such as a 1917 Singer treadle industrial sewing machine, the exhibition, A Common Thread, which opened recently in the Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum of Beth Tzedec Synagogue, offers a lively and compelling look at the history of Toronto's garment industry from the early 1900s to the present.

Although the subject is vast, it fits the museum like a glove because of the Jewish community's integral involvement in the shmata trade from the days when it dominated Spadina Avenue, to more recent times when it often seemed to dominate the financial pages as well.

By highlighting many intriguing details, the exhibition manages to capture many facets of an enormous story in a relatively small space.

A century ago, thousands of unskilled Yiddish-speaking Jews from Eastern Europe had begun to pour into what was then a predominantly Anglo-Scottish city. Taking up residence in the cramped, impoverished "Ward" neighbourhood, many found work sewing for the T. Eaton Co., Simpson's and other large firms.

Some did piecework in local sweatshops, which were never as bad as their notorious counterparts in New York. Decades later, Holocaust survivors and other immigrants continued to find their first crucial jobs within the massive industry that still dominated the Spadina-Adelaide area of the city.

In many ways the garment trade spurred the growth of a downtown Jewish neighbourhood. Many Jewish shops, restaurants and synagogues appeared in the Spadina area, as did large factory buildings and landmarks such as Kensington Market.

Only in the '60s and '70s, when downtown rents began to skyrocket, did the fashion industry begin to move into the suburbs, and the neighbourhood entered a decline.

A central theme of A Common Thread is the labour movement. Throughout the century, workers struggled continuously for better working conditions, shorter work weeks, better wages, better job security, and more inclusive health plans. "We want a 1912 living standard!" read one worker's banner during a 1912 strike at Eaton's.

After learning the tricks of the trade, many Jewish workers left the large firms and established small tailoring shops of their own. Such operations were a mainstay of main streets from Kapuskasing to Kingston. With equal measures of work and luck, a few of these enterprises grew into large businesses, often with reputable labels that are still recognizable today.

Formerly employed at Eaton's, Abraham Posluns and son Joseph started manufacturing clothing in a tiny garage in 1914, and soon began filling orders for Eaton's and others. Half a century later, their descendants, the brothers Posluns, founded a vast clothing empire that would include such multi-million-dollar brands as Thrifty's, Harry Rosen, Tip Top Tailors, Fairweather and Club Monaco. Though mainstay Dylex went bankrupt, other Posluns corporate entities still thrive.

Esther Liebgott – whose maiden name, Nainudel, translates as sewing needle – designed and custom-tailored shapely undergarments so adeptly that she never lacked for clients.

"She supported her family for 40 years with her home sewing business," exhibition curator Dorion Liebgott recalled of her mother-in-law, one of numerous operators spotlighted in the show who became minor legends in the community.

A Common Thread reminisces over many such tales of clever industriousness. Specializing in top-quality gowns for brides, bridesmaids and others in the wedding party, the Paloma Blanca by Blue Bird label has reversed a predominant industry trend by exporting its wares all over the world. The exhibition also celebrates the sparkling sartorial talents of dress designers like Rae Hildebrandt and Maggie Reeves.

Part of a display on the fur industry, Jewish fur trapper Jack Leve used to traipse through the wilds of northern Ontario, but "never without his canoe, snowshoes, knife, and some kosher salami," a caption explains.

Like a huge walk-in closet, the exhibition also features colourful references to varied other aspects of the industry from shoes to hats.

According to Liebgott, who spent three years in researching and planning, the exhibition couldn't have been done on a small budget. She attained a $75,000 grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation as well as funding from many other supporters

"I knew that we had to do an exhibit on the garment industry but I didn't know what I was taking on at the time," she said. "It's such a huge story, and as large as I thought it was, it was even larger."

The exhibition continues through next June. Admission is free; a souvenir booklet costs $20. For information on museum hours or to book a tour, phone 416-781-3514, ext. 32 or email museum@beth-tzedec.org.

Holocaust weighs heavy on the second generation

By ADI NEUBERGER
Special to The CJN

The incidence of post-traumatic stress syndrome among Holocaust survivors is somewhere between 50 and 60 per cent compared to the 15 to 20 per cent rate among the general population, according to trauma expert Anna Baranovsky.

"Many children of survivors suffer from secondary trauma as a result of their parents relaying their horrific experiences," said Baranovsky, a psychologist and second-generation survivor.

Issues such as death in survivor families and marrying into a survivor family were recently explored by more than 300 adult children of survivors at the Survivor Families conference held at the Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre, part of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The conference, which took place on the 56th anniversary of Kristallnacht as part of Holocaust Education Week, was co-sponsored by Baycrest, UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress.

According to Paula David, senior social worker and co-ordinator of Baycrest's Holocaust resource project, who co-chaired the conference along with Eva Dojc and Marjorie Levitt, survivors and their children experience death differently.

"Many children of survivors are into their 40s and 50s before they ever go to a funeral."

This, according to David, gives rise to a unique set of experiences surrounding death that can be much more profound for the second generation.

"There is a greater sense of loss because all the family history and continuity are lost together with the parent."

On the other hand, said David, being close to a survivor in their final hours of life can be exhilarating because they are often at the "peak of their wisdom and reflection."

Emotions ran high as the audience listened to a panel that included David; Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; Cary Green, son-in-law of survivor and Holocaust education activist Nate Leipciger ; and Baranowsky.

Baranovsky sees the emotional weight slung on the shoulders of second generation survivors as a source of great strength as well as pain.

"One doesn't have to carry the wounds. Studies show survivors can be stronger and this too can be passed on to children," said Baranovsky.

Green, who is married to the daughter of Leipciger, agrees that life can be enriched by the impact survivors have on their families.

At age 14, Leipciger was liberated from Aushwitz Birkenau together with his father who had saved him from death on more than one occasion

"I've been fortunate to have married into the family of a survivor," said Green. "Every simchah we have is elevated spiritually because Nate is determined to celebrate on behalf of family members who perished."

Dojc said that "it is unbelievable to see so many of you here today, especially since we were not supposed to be here."

MP favours legalizing same-sex marriage

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Despite his religious beliefs, MP Irwin Cotler says he is in favour of legalizing same-sex civil marriage, but will abide by a Supreme Court reference on the issue that is expected next year.

Cotler told The CJN he wanted to clarify where he stood because of his absence from the House of Commons in September for a Canadian Alliance motion asking MPs to reaffirm the heterosexual definition of marriage.

The motion was defeated 137-132 after a six-hour debate.

"My absence was not a political statement," Cotler said. "Had I been there I would have voted against it because that motion was inappropriate and premature, because a reference to the Supreme Court was pending."

The high court recently announced it would begin consideration in April of a set of questions on the legal implications of same-sex marriage put to it by the federal government.

Cotler said that on the day of the vote – Sept. 17 – he was in Washington, D.C., for engagements he had committed to attend much earlier, notably the 25th anniversary celebration of Parliamentarians for Global Action, which he addressed on behalf of Canadian parliamentarians.

"I am MP for Mount Royal, not for any religious grouping, but I do take into consideration the views of my constituents. I believe the majority of Jews would prefer a civil union [for homosexual couples], rather than marriage. Also most of the Muslims. There is a traditionalist sensibility in the riding that has to be taken into account," he said.

"But the equality rights guaranteed in the charter also have to be taken into account, and as constitutional law professor, I take them very seriously."

Cotler believes no religious authorities should be obliged to perform same-sex marriages or unions. One of the questions the government has put to the Supreme Court is whether the Charter of Rights' section on freedom of religion protects religious officials from being compelled to marry homosexuals.

Despite his affiliation with traditional Judaism, Cotler noted that he was a pioneer in defending the rights of gays and lesbians. In 1974, while a professor at McGill University, he represented a gay group that wanted sexual orientation included as a prohibited form of discrimination in the Quebec Charter of Human Rights. That battle was successful and Quebec was the first province to enshrine the right.

Food as visual art

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Sharon Haas has turned food into a visual art. Haas teaches groups of students how to cut and carve fruit and vegetables both for serving on individual plates and for a buffet table.

She prepares carved edible centrepieces on special order for parties and other special occasions.

"Our mothers tell us not to play with our food, but I show how to play with food to make it attractive, a showpiece, a conversation starter, an attraction almost too beautiful to ruin by eating."

There are many ways to make a table look good, she says. "You can use garden flowers and greens, or items such as vases and artwork to enhance your table."

Haas came from generations of gastronomers. Her grandmother, Masha Logan was a caterer in Toronto.

"My late mother, Freda Garfinkel, was a woman whose home had rubber walls – everyone was always welcome at our table. She taught me and my siblings how to take a simple recipe and make it look professional."

She adds that her three children, Lee, Jeff and Susanna have inherited the same love of food and entertaining, "and they use their presentation genes well."

Born in Toronto and raised in Vancouver, Haas studied fine arts at the University of British Columbia. She moved to Toronto in 1966 and worked in public relations and advertising. She now works with her husband Paul Haas, owner of Impression, which deals in corporate gift promotional products with corporate logos added.

She studied carving techniques at George Brown College and attended other culinary schools for cake decorating, chocolate making and special menus. "But most of what I do is self-taught and experimental.

"When people go on a cruise, they take pictures of the scenery. I take pictures of the buffet tables. I like to see what the newest trends are."

Haas is known as the Martha Stewart of her Hadassah WIZO chapter Ateret. She decorates her chapter's booth at the Hadassah Bazaar and has received several first-place ribbons.

At the Shaar Shalom Synagogue where she is a past president of the sisterhood, she has enhanced the meeting décor for the holidays and social events.

"I love to entertain and I always try new recipes. As a Jewish homemaker, it is challenging for me to come up with appropriate kosher and pareve substitutions. Today, it is much easier to follow kashrut because substitutions are plentiful and the vegetarian genre is growing."

She adds that the best thing about food is that if you make a mistake, you can eat it. With everyday kitchen paring knives and scoopers and some creative tools, she has developed techniques for carving centrepieces that are artistic sculptures.

"Carving edible centrepieces is relaxing and rewarding for me and I enjoy sharing my knowledge with others."

Here are two of Sharon Haas' recipes – Chocolate Raspberry Torte and Tomato, Brie and Onion Strudel. She notes that for the Chocolate Raspberry Torte, the key is to use good quality chocolate. "It looks difficult to make but it is very easy."

For information on a cooking demonstration call Haas at 416-494-0875.

CHOCOLATE RASPBERRY TORTE

Cake:
2¼ cups all-purpose flour
2 cups sugar
⅔ cup cocoa
1½ tsp. baking powder
1½ tsp. baking soda
1½ tsp. instant coffee (optional)
1½ cups orange juice
3 eggs
1⅓ cups oil
seedless raspberry jam (to spread on finished cake layers)

Buttercream:
3 oz. bittersweet chocolate
¾ cup unsalted pareve margarine (sweet butter may be used for dairy)
¾ cup confectioner's sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
2 eggs (room temperature)
1½ tbsp. cocoa
½ tsp. instant coffee (optional)
1 tsp. liqueur (optional)

Glaze:
5 tbsp. unsalted margarine (or sweet butter)
4 tbsp. corn syrup
5 oz. bittersweet chocolate
1 tbsp. liqueur (optional)

Cake: Preheat oven to 350. Combine all dry cake ingredients in food processor until blended. Add eggs and orange juice. Start processor and then add oil slowly through feed tube while machine is running. Process batter for 45 seconds. Pour batter into a well-greased 10-inch cake pan. Bake for 60 to 75 minutes, until cake tests done. Cool for at least 20 minutes before removing cake from pan.

Buttercream: Melt chocolate. Stir in cocoa and instant coffee and set aside. With mixmaster, cream butter until light in colour and add sugar in 4-5 portions, beating well after each addition. Add vanilla, then beat on high for 3 minutes until very pale in colour. Add eggs, one at a time, and beat for 2 minutes after each addition. Add chocolate mixture to the buttercream, mix well, and then add liqueur, if using.

To assemble:

Divide cooled cake into two layers. (Use dental floss: place floss around cake at desired height, cross the two ends and just pull.) Sprinkle each half with liqueur, then spread each half with seedless raspberry jam. Spread buttercream on one half of cake, then place other half on top (with jam sides together).

Glaze: Melt butter, corn syrup and chocolate on warm/low in microwave. Stir together until smooth and shiny. Add liqueur, if desired, and stir again until smooth. Let cool for about 8 minutes, then pour and spread glaze over the top and sides of the cake. You can decorate with fresh raspberries while glaze is warm. Refrigerate until glaze is firm, at least one hour, or until needed. Warm to room temperature to serve.

This cake makes an outstanding contribution to a dessert buffet. It looks as if it took hours by a trained professional – and only you will know how really easy it was!

(For an even more spectacular dessert, if you have the time and inclination, make two cakes, double the buttercream and glaze, and make a 4-layer tower!)

Trampoline athlete snares silver at world championship

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Samantha Sendel's goal at last month's World Age Group Trampoline Championships in Hanover, Germany, was to earn herself a place in the final group with a top-six finish.

Samantha Sendel

She achieved that and much more, winning a silver medal in the girls 11-12 individual trampoline and then teaming up with Katherine McLeod to place fourth in the girls 11-12 synchro event.

The 12-year-old's results came as relief to her nervous father Nevin, who was back at their Aurora, Ont., home constantly checking the event's Web site for updates on his daughter's performance.

"I didn't know what was happening," he recalls. "My wife couldn't operate the Net properly over there and couldn't get to a phone to keep us updated.

"My mother was in from Montreal to help look after my three sons and we're all plotzing, dying a little every minute. They updated a picture every five or 10 minutes. When we saw [Samantha's] picture on the site warming up in the main venue, [we realized] she must have made finals in one event or another, so at least you breathe."

Sendel's performance in her international debut would have, in fact, ranked her in the top-five in the more advanced under-15 category.

The four-foot-eight, 80-pound athlete won four golds and a bronze last May in Saskatoon at her first National Trampoline and Age Group Championships.

She trains five days a week for 1¾ hours with coach Dave Ross at Skyriders Trampoline Place in Richmond Hill. In the three years they've been together, Sendel also has a first-place finish at the Ontario Winter Games and has won every Ontario Cup qualifier, as well as the provincial championship in the National Novice category.

She'll move into the national youth category later this month, competing against much older athletes, many of whom can exceed her degree of difficulty. A top-three ranking will be required at the national qualifiers to once again represent Canada on the world stage.

Her father says that for Samantha, it's never really been about competition, just pure enjoyment of the sport.

"She really loves to train," he said. "She enjoys the camaraderie of the athletes and likes her friends at the gym. Competition is sort of the end result.

"Whether or not she'll ever be an Olympian is really less important than the opportunity over the next six, seven, eight years to travel to different continents, meet people from different countries, have that experience."

Originally from Montreal, the Grade 7 French immersion student at Lester B. Pearson public school has always been athletic.

At age three, she took up artistic gymnastics and was a Provincial Level 1 medalist in 2001. She quit the sport last year to focus on trampoline, but continues to play rep soccer for Vaughan's top club.

Israel offers to help Greece with Olympic security

By CJN Wire Services

ATHENS — Israel has offered to help Greece secure the 2004 Olympic Games by sending vessels for sea patrols to prevent suspected terrorists from entering the country, according to a report in a Greek newspaper.

The offer, reported last week by the Athens daily Ta Nea, could also include sending frogmen to help guard Greek ports during the games, which will run from Aug. 13-29.

Because of an accommodation shortage, organizers plan to house more than 10,000 officials and visitors aboard 11 cruise ships in the port of Piraeus near Athens.

Greek officials would not confirm the report and the Israeli Embassy in Athens refused to comment. Greece has ordered three Israeli patrol boats to boost its coast guard fleet before the Olympics.

There are fears that terrorists aiming at Olympic targets could use clandestine routes used to smuggle thousands of illegal immigrants into Greece each year. Many of the immigrants are smuggled into Greece across the eastern Mediterranean and Aegean seas.

The problem was discussed last week by FBI director Robert Mueller, who visited Athens to review its security plans for the games.

Israel and the United States are members of a seven-nation Olympic security advisory group helping Greece plan for the games. Greece has budgeted a record $775 million (US) for Olympic security.

The U.S. Coast Guard has also reportedly offered to help patrol the seas around Greece during the games.

"Never compromise your integrity," he said in a calm voice.

I stared at the movie producer in surprise and asked what he meant.

"You will figure it out for yourself. Good luck."

He turned and walked away. I felt I was on a hidden-camera show. But no one came to tell me it was a joke and I was left speechless and confused.

A few weeks earlier, I had arrived in Los Angeles to follow my dream of becoming a professional actor.

I was determined to work hard and make contacts within the industry. That day in particular, I snuck onto a major Hollywood studio to give out my acting picture and resumé to unsuspecting producers, directors and studio executives. I once read that before Steven Spielberg was famous, he pretended he worked at Universal Studios and turned an abandoned trailer into a makeshift office. He was my inspiration as I dodged security and pretended I belonged on various television and movie sets. I met a lot of people as I was doing this, but only one gave me advice that lasted a lifetime.

Later that evening, I looked up integrity in the dictionary.

The definition read, "The quality of possessing and steadfastly adhering to high moral principles or professional standards. The state of being complete, undivided and honest."

At the time, I was unsure how this definition would affect my life. But as I began working in the city, I had to confront compromising situations and challenges I never thought I would face. Would I accept acting roles with nudity, work on films that were degrading to women, go to parties with illegal substances or date older producers to further my career? Hollywood will test your morals and push you to the limit. But if you stick to your beliefs, you might just make it out alive.

Back in Toronto, my peers and I face ethical conflicts at work, challenges in relationships, tough choices about our political views on Israel and our level of Jewish observance, while remaining honest with ourselves, family and friends. Do we tell our non-Jewish boss we cannot work on the High Holy Days? Do we date only other Jews? Do we settle for a partner for fear of being alone? Do we decide against going to our best friend's engagement party on Friday night if we are shomer Shabbat?

We all have different answers to these questions, because what is right for one person may be wrong for another. People or circumstances constantly test us, whether we're in Hollywood or Toronto. When I am faced with difficult decisions, I think back to the best advice I ever got. Never compromise your integrity.

UNITED JEWISH COMMUNITIES & THE FEDERATIONS OF NORTH AMERICA
STANDING WITH ISRAEL IN ISRAEL

Thousands of people marched through downtown Jerusalem last week in a salute to the city by delegates to the United Jewish Communities General Assembly (GA), which convened for the second time in five years in Israel's capital. Some 4,300 people attended the GA this year. The march ended at Zion Square with singing and dancing. Inset, a group of Canadian youth show their colours. [Isranet photos]

Fini condemns Italy's fascist past

Deputy prime minister in Israel on official visit

Gianfranco Fini

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Italian Deputy Prime Minister Gianfranco Fini on Monday condemned his country's fascist past and said lessons must be learned to deal with racism and anti-Semitism today.

Fini was speaking at the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial museum on the first day of a four-day official visit meant to purge his own neo-fascist past, which included an expression of admiration for Italian dictator Benito Mussolini.

Wearing a purple skullcap and a pin with the Italian and Israeli flags, Fini rekindled a memorial flame at the museum built in memory of the six million Jews killed in the Nazi genocide during World War II.

Speaking under a rainy sky outside the museum, Fini said: "We have to condemn the shameful chapters in the history of our people and to try to understand why complacency, collaboration and fear caused no reaction from many Italians in 1938 to the disgraceful, fascist race laws.

"We have to do this, not only to settle accounts with the past, but to prepare for the future. We have to do this so it is clear to all today, in 2003, with the racism and anti-Semitism, that no one can say, 'I am not connected, it has nothing to do with me, it is not my place to respond,' " he said.

Fini, head of Italy's National Alliance party, is the first leader of the former post-fascist party associated with Mussolini to be received in Israel with pomp and ceremony.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Grafstein Feted

NEW YORK — Senator Jerry Grafstein and Pamela Wallin, Canada's consul general in New York, were honoured at the Canadian Society of New York's annual ball on Nov. 14 . Both were big promoters of the "Canada Loves New York" rally in November 2001.

Shoah Bill Passed

OTTAWA — A bill proclaiming a national Holocaust Memorial Day passed in the Senate and received royal assent Nov. 12, marking Yom Hashoah as the day to educate Canadians about the murder of six million Jews. It was one of a handful of bills enacted prior to Parliament being prorogued.

ISRAEL

BBC Boycott Lifted

JERUSALEM — Foreign Ministry officials said last week Israel would lift its boycott of the British Broadcasting Corp. after it named an ombudsman to monitor its Mideast coverage and said it was committed to objective reporting of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Israel has long charged the BBC with bias and boycotted it last summer after a show on Israel's nuclear program implied it's a rogue state.

Slump Over: Netanyahu

JERUSALEM — Israel's recession is over, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week after Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics announced Israel's gross domestic product increased by 2.7 per cent in the third quarter. Imported goods and services were also up 27.5 per cent, the bureau said.

One in seven depressed

JERUSALEM — One in seven Israelis is clinically depressed, a new poll says. The poll, published last week to mark Israeli Mental Health Week, said 10 per cent of the population feels "life is not worth living," while 60 per cent show symptoms of depression. The New Wave polling firm also found 13 per cent of Israelis could be considered clinically depressed. Referring to the country's security and economic woes, pharmaceutical expert Dr. Orna Dolberg told Ma'ariv the findings "are not surprising, perhaps, but should serve as a warning."

WORLD

Formula Maker Fires 4

BERLIN — Humana, the German maker of a baby formula believed responsible for the deaths of several Israeli babies, last week fired four managers – in product development, quality control and its chemical lab – after tests showed the kosher Remedia Super Soya 1 product contained less than one-tenth the advertised amount of crucial vitamin B1, Ha'aretz reported. An internal probe showed analytical errors and quality control failures were to blame for the deficient product, Humana CEO Albert Grosse Frie said, adding that Humana would tighten its procedures.

Arson Suspected

TERRE HAUTE, Ind. — Arson is suspected in a fire that destroyed a small Holocaust museum here last week. "Remember Timmy McVeigh," a reference to the Oklahoma City bomber, was scrawled on a wall of the Children of Auschwitz Nazi Deadly Experiments Survivors museum, known as Candles. Founded in 1985, it housed items from Auschwitz and documents relating to the notorious Dr. Josef Mengele.

Germany Drops Claim

BERLIN — Germany has withdrawn its appeals of a court decision awarding the Claims Conference rights to Berlin-area properties belonging to the Wertheim family that are reportedly worth several hundred million dollars. Most of the family, which owned department stores in Germany before the war, was killed in the Holocaust. Before it can recover the land, the Claims Conference must overcome a competing claim. If recovered, the land or sale proceeds would go into the organizations's Goodwill fund, which gives 80 per cent to the asset's heirs and keeps 20 per cent for the organization, a spokesperson said.

Chirac Pledges Action Against Anti-Semitism

PARIS — Jewish leaders in France have welcomed new government proposals to get tough on anti-Semitism.

Speaking after they met President Jacques Chirac last week, Haim Muzicant, executive director of the CRIF umbrella organization of French Jews, said Chirac "sent a strong message to all those who would wish to commit attacks against Jews. This is the kind of talk we have been waiting for."

Chirac earlier convened a special meeting of government ministers and announced that Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin would head a new cabinet committee to fight anti-Semitism. The committee is to meet monthly to examine reported anti-Semitic acts and decide on punishment, Raffarin said.

The proposals follow a suspected arson attack Nov. 15 that gutted part of a Jewish school near Paris. Raffarin said security would be beefed up outside synagogues and Jewish community institutions, while the government would ensure that heavy sentences were handed out to perpetrators.

"Whoever attacks a Jew in France must understand they are attacking the whole of France," Chirac told reporters.

Later, while announcing new measures to fight anti-Semitism in French schools, Education Minister Luc Ferry said right-wing anti-Semitism "has totally disappeared" in France. But he said the country now faces a new anti-Semitism that is Islamic in origin and "clearly linked" to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Also last week, in an interview on Radio Shalom, the community station, France's chief rabbi, Joseph Sitruk, advised French Jews to wear baseball caps instead of kippot while not in their homes, in order "to prevent being attacked in the street."

Israeli deputy prime minister Ehud Olmert (left) with Jerusalem mayor Uri Lupolianski. [Isranet photo]

Israel may set its own border with PA, deputy PM warns

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel may have to draw its border with the Palestinians unilaterally, Israel's deputy prime minister Ehud Olmert warns.

If a peace agreement with the Palestinian Authority seems unattainable, Israel will have no alternative but to take action to protect its interests, Olmert said in an exclusive interview during a brief visit to Toronto earlier this month.

"Time is running out," said Olmert, who is also Israel's minister of industry and trade. "We can't afford to wait forever."

Olmert also defended a controversial statement he made in September that killing PA President Yasser Arafat is still an option Israel can exercise.

"This question is as relevant today as it was two months ago," he declared, apparently contradicting Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's recent remark that Israel has no plans to kill Arafat.

Commenting on the sensitive border issue, Olmert said Israel is fast heading toward a crucial crossroads.

"Israel has to make a choice between reaching an agreement with the Palestinians, which is highly unlikely, or taking unilateral steps to determine its border."

Olmert explained that Israel's "political border" should essentially be based on demographic considerations.

"The two guidelines should be to maximize the number of Jews and to minimize the number of Arabs."

Olmert readily acknowledged that any move by Israel to fix its border will be of lasting importance.

"It will be a major strategic decision. It will influence Israeli politics for many years."

He would not be drawn into a discussion as to timing, but said, "It should be sooner rather than later."

Jerusalem mayor visits Toronto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jerusalem mayor Uri Lupolianski was scheduled to be in Toronto Nov. 26 for a whirlwind one-day visit.

It was to be his first overseas trip since his victory in last June's municipal election.

Lupolianski, an ordained rabbi and the city's first haredi mayor, was inititally appointed to the position, becoming acting mayor after his predecessor, current Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, tendered his resignation last winter and ran for a seat in the Knesset on the Likud list.

Lupoliansky, who says his goal is to maintain the religious status quo in Jerusalem, was coming to Toronto to drum up support for Yad Sarah, the largest voluntary organization in Israel.

Named for Lupoliansky's grandmother, who was murdered in the Holocaust, Yad Sarah provides relief to the sick, elderly and people with disabilities by lending medical and rehabilitative equipment on a short-term basis free of charge, and by running low-

Jerusalem GA notes (1)

From the editor's desk

It was my great fortune to be in Jerusalem last week to represent The CJN at the General Assembly (GA) of the United Jewish Communities of North America (UJC).

Over the next three weeks, I will use this space to record some of my observations from the four-day gathering.

* * *

Sunday night:

The atmosphere at the opening ceremonies in Binyanei Ha'ouma, Jerusalem's conference centre, was electric. The air crackled with high energy, back-slapping enthusiasm and good feelings, as if we were attending a huge reunion.

More than 6,000 people packed the building, some two-thirds of whom had come from North America. I was one of 32 foreign reporters on hand.

The roster of speakers for the opening event was impressive. It always is. In addition to UJC lay leaders and event chairs, it included Israel's president and prime minister, the mayor of Jerusalem and the head of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI).

But most of the people in the audience were as excited at the thought of hearing the renowned singer Achinoam Nini – Noa, as she is popularly called – as they were to hear the quartet of celebrity leaders.

The speakers were firebrands, or tried to be, in their own way. Because they were speaking primarily to fellow Jews from the Diaspora, they imparted messages of – indeed pleaded for – participation in the great gift of Jewish peoplehood. (The gist of their messages were reported last week.)

President Moshe Katsav beseeched the federation leaders in the audience to place identity-building high on the communal agenda. His prescription was education.

"Jewish education," he said, "should be available for every Jew in the Diaspora." After expanding on the theme, he concluded his remarks with a dramatic flourish that elicited a standing ovation. "We are one people, one history, one future, one heritage, one tradition and one big family."

He set the tone for subsequent speakers. And Prime Minister Ariel Sharon carried the president's message further.

"What can you do for Israel?" he asked the audience rhetorically. And then he answered his own question.

"Be Jewish. Educate your children to be Jewish. Give them a Jewish, Zionist education. Make aliyah. Encourage visits to Israel among your friends. Invest in Israel. Be ambassadors for the Jewish people and for the Jewish state."

He concluded his remarks with a touch of tenderness not usually associated with the prime minister.

"During the War of Independence, I fought in the nearby fields and mountainside in the battle for Jerusalem. And I was wounded. Being wounded was painful. But being left alone on the battlefield was more painful.

"Today, 55 years later," the prime minister said, pausing slightly to emphasize his concluding words, "we are no longer alone."

Another standing ovation.

Monday:

The morning and early afternoon were divided into myriad programs. In all, over the four days, more than 250 different discussions and sessions were held.

In the mid-afternoon, delegates gathered in the main assembly hall/theatre to see and hear a tribute to the spirit of the IDF.

The leader of the session was Julia Koschitzky, chair of the JAFI education committee (and a member of the board of directors of The CJN). She eloquently summarized the significance of the afternoon program.

"We are here to pay tribute to the 18-, 19- and 20-year-old sons and daughters of the IDF who left their homes but didn't say goodbye, too many of whom did not return, falling in the field defending our land and our dignity with their last breath."

The featured guest was IDF chief of staff, Gen. Moshe Ya'alon. Tall, bespectacled, bald, with ramrod straight posture, Ya'alon resembles an earnest auditor on a mission of forensic discovery more than a decorated soldier on a mission of national defence. He was admiringly and appreciatively received by the audience.

But the most effusive response was elicited by two chayalim bodedim, "lonely" soldiers – the phrase used to describe volunteers from abroad whose families are not in Israel – who spoke about the nature of their responsibilities in the army and their reasons for volunteering.

One was a young woman from California, the other a young man from New York. Both were the subjects of short video presentations who were invited to speak about themselves and their experiences. The Californian spoke at length. The New Yorker was considerably shyer and haltingly answered Koschitzky's questions.

At the end of the short interview, Koschitzky received a telephone call on her cellular phone. Or so we thought. The call was for the young, bashful soldier. She gave him the phone. He heard his name called. But there was no one at the other end of the line. He heard his name again. But again, no one was on the line.

Perplexed, he looked away from the malfunctioning phone to see his mother walking briskly towards him from the other end of the stage. He ran to her, arms outstretched. They embraced and held each other for considerable moments. Her sobs of happiness could be heard by everyone.

The GA organizers had flown her to Jerusalem from New York to be with her son, whom she had not seen for more than a year. As I looked around, I could see no one who was not crying. –MBD

GA BASH IN TEL AVIV

Thousands of delegates at the GA in Jerusalem danced and partied to exhaustion last Tuesday night at the Suzanne Dellal Center in the Neveh Tzedek district of Tel Aviv. Delegates had just returned from their respective field trips around Israel. Organizers had arranged 57 different-themed bus trips throughout the country. At the end of the day, delegates relaxed at the party hosted by the municipality of Tel Aviv.

Author deals with tensions between Muslims, Jews

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Irshad Manji confronted head-on the tensions between Israel and the Muslim world when she appeared at three Toronto campuses last week.

The talks by the Muslim TV personality and bestselling author of The Trouble With Islam, called "Defending Israel is Defending Diversity," went smoothly at York University and the University of Toronto, but caused a stir at Ryerson University, where students complained about Manji's appearance and the student union withdrew its endorsement of the event.

Manji's appearance at all three campuses was sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto, and was also endorsed by four other campus groups at U of T, but only by KULANU, the Jewish gay and lesbian organization, at York and Ryerson universities.

RyeSAC, the Ryerson students administrative council, handed out flyers in the lecture hall the day of the event stating they do not endorse Manji's talk.

Rob Emerson, RyeSAC's general manager, said the group decided to withdraw its endorsement because "some folks on campus didn't want their student organization taking pro-Israel positions in the current conflict."

At the three campuses, Manji spoke about the need to defend countries that promote western multicultural values, including Israel. While she criticized some of the Jewish state's current policies regarding the Palestinians, Manji supported Israel's democracy, pointing out its basis in the principles of social justice that allow citizens legal recourse when the state impacts on their rights.

A visit to Israel shattered many of her preconceptions about the country, Manji said, and she realized that "Israel is one mother of a pluralistic place" that has a breadth and depth of diversity that exists in few countries in the world, let alone in the Middle East.

Manji encouraged her audience to hold Muslim states up to the same standards as western countries and to support governments that protect differences, including the freedom to express diverse opinions without fear of government reprisal.

Palestinian, Jewish students engaged in dialogue at York

Ann Whiteside at Ryerson's discrimination and harassment prevention office said she received "many concerns" from students on campus and elsewhere about Manji's appearance. However, the office allowed the lecture to proceed because they felt it was an issue of free speech.

"It is important to allow universities to be marketplaces of ideas where all viewpoints can be presented," Whiteside said.

After hearing Manji's talk, she said, "It was a very necessary discussion."

The day after Manji's presentation at Ryerson, the Muslim Student Association and the Arab Student Association presented counter speakers and a table in the hallway of Jorgenson Hall with signs that read "Defending Palestine is Defending Humanity," despite a university policy that forbids public lectures in hallway lounges.

The policy, which was enacted for safety reasons as well as to prevent political views from being forced on students, is a relatively new one, said Ryerson's director of public affairs Bruce Piercey.

Piercey said there was a miscommunication between Ryerson's student services and the student union. Organizers of the presentation claimed they were told it was acceptable to hold their lecture in the hallway, he said.

However, despite the fact that arrangements were made to move to a room nearby, the students voted to stay and refused to change locations.

Since "there was a fairly large group, it was decided to let them go ahead with their presentation," Piercey said.

Amy Greenfeld, program co-ordinator of Hillel at Ryerson, said it is particularly upsetting to see posters in the school with the entire state of Israel covered with a keffiyah, and then see that the counter-demonstration was allowed to proceed despite the fact that members from Ryerson security, student services and the discrimination and harassment office were there.

Greenfeld said Jewish student organizations go by the rules and book all events in private rooms, adding she hopes Ryerson won't use this incident to punish Jewish students by restricting all Middle East discussion.

Meanwhile, at York University, Manji's talk connected the Jewish and Muslims students in groundbreaking discussions.

Palestinian and Jewish students met afterward and talked for hours with Manji in the Hillel office, where Muslim students condemned suicide bombings and Jewish students criticized the Israeli treatment of the Palestinians.

"Manji's talk brought everyone together," said Seth Winberg, a Hillel vice-president at York University, and efforts are now being made to put together the first Muslim and Jewish anti-suicide bombing demonstration.

CORRECTION

In the article, "Fight the 'new anti-Semitism,' journalist tells students" (CJN, Nov. 20), the sponsor of the lecture at Ryerson University by journalist Martin Himel was incorrectly identified. His talk was sponsored by the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation with assistance from Hillel of Greater Toronto. The CJN regrets the error.

Rabbi compares Kach founder to Moshe Rabeinu

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Eye-catching signs along Bathurst Street in recent weeks touting a lecture titled "Kahane was Right" brought out two crowds of roughly equal size to the Chabad Lubavitch centre in Thornhill last Thursday night – one to attend a memorial service for the late Rabbi Meir Kahane and the other to protest the event.

About 75 people carried signs outside the building decrying the radical views of the late Rabbi Kahane, known for his belief that Arabs in Israel should leave the country – by force if necessary – in order to preserve the country and the future of the Jewish people.

He served for a time as a member of Knesset, but was banned by Israel's Supreme Court, which prohibited openly racist candidates from standing for election.

The firebrand rabbi, who founded the militant Jewish Defense League in New York and the far-right Kach political party in Israel, was shot to death by an Egyptian national in New York in November 1990.

His son Binyamin led the movement after his father's death and founded Kahane Chai, an offshoot of Kach. In 1994, Israel's cabinet outlawed both groups as terrorist organizations.

Binyamin Kahane and his wife were shot to death by Palestinian gunmen in December 2000.

The memorial was organized by the United Israel Action Committee, a grassroots community umbrella group that advocates for Israel.

Protesters outside carried signs saying "Kahane was Wrong," "Community Leaders United Against Racism" and "Say No to Racism." Rabbis representing a cross section of Jewish observance were on hand, as were members of Yosher, the Jewish Network for Social Justice.

The protest – without incident save for a a few heated words exchanged between the two sides – was triggered by the "in-your-face" signs along Bathurst Street, said organizer Martin Lockshin.

"We're not thrilled that a Jewish memorial preaches hatred," said Lockshin, an Orthodox rabbi and director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University. He stressed, however, that he had nothing against Chabad, which hosted the event.

The protesters were there "to stand up against the racist corruption of Judaism," said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation. The "vast majority" of Israelis, he added, are neither on the far left nor the far right of the political spectrum.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein of Kolel, the Adult Centre For Liberal Jewish Learning, said the protesters represented "the voice of the rational, dialogue, discussion and, hopefully, peace. The easiest thing in the world is to say 'Kill 'em.' That's not a rational discussion."

Inside the centre, about 75 people gathered to hear speaker David Halvri, Binyamin Kahane's brother-in-law from Israel, but a plane connection from Chicago delayed him.

Instead, Rabbi Moshe Stern of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, praised Rabbi Kahane as "a man of phenomenal courage, who loved God with all his heart and soul," and said he had "great vision and prophetic insight."

The late rabbi "in a loose sense, can be compared to Moshe Rabeinu," Rabbi Stern said.

"Everything he said was true."

Of the protesters, Rabbi Stern said, "I pity them. They don't know their own Bible."

He recalled Rabbi Kahane preaching from Shaarei Tefillah's pulpit in 1982, after which he was arrested as a persona non grata.

Eventually, "every Jew will see the righteousness of what [Rabbi Kahane] stood for. We will not rest until the entire land of Israel, as stated in the Torah, is in the hands of the Jewish people," Rabbi Stern said.

Meir Halevi, head of the local chapter of the Jewish Defense League, said Rabbi Kahane "was right about one thing: anti-Semitism is spreading the world over."

Rabbi Ronnie Cahana, the former spiritual leader of Toronto's Lodzer Holocaust Congregation who is now at Congregation Beth-El in Montreal, said he was raised a liberal but is now changing his thinking.

He described Rabbi Meir Kahane, his late cousin, as "the gentlest, kindest person."

Rabbi Cahana led kaddish.

Iran's nuclear threat

At a special security meeting Sunday, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon announced that he would personally head a ministerial steering committee to co-ordinate Israel's response to the growing likelihood that Iran will acquire nuclear weapons capability in the foreseeable future. Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz and Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom will also serve on the committee.

The committee will oversee a four-pronged response system:

- security and intelligence aspects directed by the head of the Mossad, Meir Dagan, that will include handling ties with foreign intelligence agencies;
- scientific-technological aspects directed by the Israel Atomic Energy Commission, which will also maintain ties with the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna;
- diplomatic efforts by the Foreign Ministry to convince international leaders to take steps against the Iranian threat;
- the activities of a joint Israel-U.S. committee on Iran's nuclear military capability that will be co-ordinated by Israel's National Security Council.

Although Israel has been effectively monitoring Iran's nuclear program for some time, the new oversight arrangement was put in place and announced only this past weekend, presumably because the Israelis are increasingly concerned over the international community's apparently questionable resolve to prevent Iran from "going nuclear."

Israel's concern is entirely justified.

Last Friday, at a meeting in Frankfurt, Germany, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) failed to agree on the wording of a resolution regarding Iran's clandestine nuclear program. Not surprisingly, European diplomats differed with their American counterparts over the issue.

The agency is considering the next step against Iran in light of the report filed by agency head Mohammed El-Baradei that chronicled Iran's secret nuclear activities, stretching over 18 years and including its use of advanced laser technology to enrich uranium.

The United States is demanding a tougher approach against the Iranian regime than the Europeans are willing to impose. The issue is scheduled to be on the agency's agenda again this week.

Writing in the Wall Street Journal last week, Gary Milhollin, director of the Wisconsin Project on Nuclear Arms Control, said, "Iran's cheating is a study in how far a country can get in making bomb material while pretending to comply with inspections. Iran seems to have set a record: it duped IAEA inspectors for 18 years. Now the mask is off."

Unmasked, the Iranian regime shows a face that glowers with menace and malevolence towards the Jewish state. In the absence of any meaningful response by the international community, Israel is left with no alternative but to plan, alone, if necessary, for all contingencies. It dare not leave the safety of its citizens in the hands of an equivocating, possibly craven, international community.

No monopolistic representation

Your article on the swearing in of the new provincial government ("Ottawa's Rabbi Bulka adds Jewish touch to McGuinty's big day," CJN, Oct. 30) finished with a sentence that began, "Representing the Jewish community at the ceremony was Bernie Farber…"

We would like to point out that Farber did not represent the Jewish community. He represented the Canadian Jewish Congress, an organization within the Jewish community.

Indeed, no one person can represent or speak for the entire Jewish community.

We should not undermine Israel

Bernard Katz of Toronto ("Lauds Canada's position," Letters to the Editor, CJN, Nov. 20), like so many Jews today, is worried about what the world will think of us if we do something like build a wall. He worries that his friends and neighbours will think his people are as bad as Palestinian terrorists because the wall encompasses some of the so-called occupied territory of the West Bank. He would have the Jews there uprooted and their homes destroyed or given to the Arabs. He would have peace at any price, as long as the world sees the Jews as givers and not takers.

If Israelis moved out of Jerusalem, left all of the West Bank and handed over all of Gaza, does he think there would be peace? What kind of dream world do he and his friends live in? The Arab world is out to destroy Israel by whatever means it can.

Canada, the country we call home and love dearly, is one of those means. It votes for almost every UN Resolution condemning Israel and it took its sweet time getting rid of a terrorist group collecting funds here.

So I say to Katz, you are welcome to your views, but you are also just another means the Arab world uses to undermine Israel.

Clarification of "frum" article

The article "Twelve per cent of Montreal Jews defined as frum" (CJN, Nov. 13), about a survey recently carried out by FEDERATION CJA and Ahavas Chesed, has created misconceptions within the community. These misconceptions occurred because the article neglected to identify one of the survey's objectives.

The purpose was to identify the service needs of a specific segment of the "frum" population whose religious observances and rejection of modernity limit access to public social services and limit involvement with institutions that support these ideas. It was not designed to look at the entire Montreal Orthodox Jewish community.

The community at large recognized that very little statistical information was available to describe this group of communities and their needs. The survey, which had rabbinical endorsement, was developed to obtain a statistical and demographic profile of these communities, which are under-represented in the social services, in order to provide them with appropriate, culturally adapted services.

Ahavas Chesed developed its mandate as an interface between these communities and various social service organizations. We are certain this survey will be an important tool in planning for their future.

Editor's note: Reporter Janice Arnold did originally explain that the purpose of the survey was to identify service needs, but the information was inadvertently omitted during production. The CJN regrets the error.

McGuinty's policy discriminatory

Ontario's new Liberal government has decided to cancel the Equity in Education tax credit for private school parents that was instituted by the previous provincial government.

This is an act of overt discrimination against non-Catholic religious minorities in Ontario, as determined by the United Nations. It has also been similarly viewed by virtually every provincial and state government in North America, where public funding of private religious schools is the norm.

It is clear from the situation in all other jurisdictions in Canada that provide public funds for private religious schools, that doing so does not impact negatively on the public and Catholic school systems.

Jordan may be the answer

"Beware the New Tactic" (From the Editor's Desk, Nov. 13) correctly warns us of the dangers of a "one- state solution," arguing that this is just an extension of the Palestinian desire to destroy Israel. However, in describing it as a Palestinian idea, it omits the reason: the realization that a two-state solution will not provide a functional Palestinian state. Once the reason is clear, a one-state solution makes sense – except that the one state should be Jordan and the West Bank, not the West Bank and Israel. A one-state solution – a truly Palestinian state of Jordan and the West Bank – should be promoted by Israel. Only through such a state can peace come to Israel and the Middle East.

Add Pollard to list

While I congratulate The CJN on including the names of those MiAs and kidnapped in your "Let Our People Go" section on the Editorials and Letters page, I believe the list is, unfortunately, incomplete.

As you may be aware, the Knesset recently amended its protocol by reading the names of MiAs and captives who were captured in the course of their service to the State of Israel, at the opening session of each weekly plenum. Among those names read is the name of Jonathan Pollard (Yonatan ben Malka).

I believe it is proper and necessary for you to amend your "Let Our People Go" notice at this time.

May we merit quickly the time when that section of this fine newspaper is no longer needed.

A Birthright caravan.

My Birthright: 10 days in Israel

By RICHARD ROSENBAUM

On the first night of my Birthright trip in Israel, our tour guide Jonathan – a big guy originally from Nebraska with a fondness for the Grateful Dead – sat us all down so we could talk and get to know each other and say what we were hoping to get out of the 10-day trip. There were 31 of us, all from Canada. When it was my turn, I said that I was beginning to feel ridiculous about never having been to Israel before and that I hoped coming here could provide me with some perspective, and maybe some insight. I knew I wouldn't be disappointed.

The next day was the most intense day of my life. We went on a walking tour of Jerusalem, a truly stunning city. I won't even bother trying to describe its beauty here because I couldn't possibly do it justice. But it's at once modern and ancient, and gives off a vibe that lets you know every moment you're somewhere special.

We went to the Kotel, the Western Wall. As we got close to it, I started feeling strange, as if I would have somehow been drawn there even without our tour guide. After passing through a metal detector, we went up to the wall itself. I looked at it. I moved closer until it was directly in front of me. And then I touched it, laid both my hands on the stones, and I just felt so… I don't even know what. Moved. Touched. But it was much more a sensation than an emotion. It was as if my body was a pool of warm, still water, and someone was very gently moving their fingers through me. It was unbelievable.

That night, we went to a nearby dance club, and had an amazing time. It's the most fun I can ever remember having at a club, if not ever. I was actually dancing (albeit badly) – everyone was – and singing. After our crazy religious experience earlier in the day, this wild social experience was almost too much. But it was great.

The next day we went to Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial. There was a lot to see, but the thing that affected me most was the children's memorial. It was pitch black, lit only by the flames of yahrtzeit candles that seemed to be suspended in the air within the glass walls and ceiling. But there were also mirrors behind the candles, so as we watched their reflections reflecting off each other, it was as if these candles commemorating the murdered Jews of the Holocaust stretched out into eternity, like the stars. Seeing it like that was awe-inspiring and at the same time unimaginably sad. One girl started to cry. I nearly did, too. It was just so simple, so poignant and so horrible.

A couple of days later, eight Israeli soldiers joined our group. It wasn't a security thing. Meeting and hanging out with Israelis is part of the whole Birthright experience. They were all incredibly cool people, and they made our trip that much more special. We made friends with them immediately. These people are the faces of the Israel Defence Forces, defenders of our nation against its enemies. They care about this place so much they feel it's their duty to come to its aid. It's the only country on Earth that will always love and protect the world's Jews, even when no other country wants us. Meeting the soldiers really helped bring that fact into focus. We're the same.

We went to some archeological sites, including one at Tel Marisha, where we spelunked through caves and dug up bones and pieces of pottery, all from around the time of Judah the Maccabee. Caves have always held a magical allure for me, but I've never actually had the opportunity to climb through any, especially as ancient and genuinely mysterious as these, so it was a real thrill. The history of Israel is so rich that you could start digging pretty much anywhere and come up with something interesting. There are dozens of excavations going on at any given time and ancient ruins are regularly discovered.

We did a lot of hiking during the trip as well. One day, we woke up at 4 a.m. to climb Masada, where King Herod built his fortress and where the Zealots later held out during the Jewish Revolt, eventually choosing to die by their own hands rather than be captured or killed by the Romans. Two thousand years later, there we were, watching the sunrise, with not one Roman soldier in sight.

Another day, we hiked for seven hours in the Golan Heights. At one point, we had to rappel down a waterfall into a river and then swim across. I discovered that I really like hiking. It's very physical, but also very intellectual. There's a lot of thought, a lot of philosophy, that goes into hiking a mountain. It requires a mental focus that I find so beneficial to the functioning of my mind. I couldn't have imagined it.

We also got to visit an air force base. We watched some F-16s coming down the runway and felt this blast of hot air when they turned around. We got to see and touch one of the fighter jets close up, which was awesome. Just imagine, a fighter jet with a Magen David on it! These things keep the State of Israel alive; these are the wings that prevent the nation from falling.

Guy Kreshover, a medic on Richard Rosenbaum's Birthright trip last summer.

We also drove all the way north to the Lebanese border and heard stories from a man who moved to Israel from South Africa in 1948. The Lebanese border isn't the safest place: Hezbollah likes to fire the occasional missile into Israel from Lebanon – you know, just to keep us on our toes. But nothing like that happened while we were there. It was all cool, and it emphasized the importance of these outlying towns in protecting Israel's borders on all sides as the country's basically surrounded by enemies (or at least not the friendliest of friends).

On the second half of our trip, we stayed at the Ein Gev Kibbutz. On Shabbat, I spent the whole afternoon sitting on the beach. It was so hot and beautiful, and I was so happy just to be there, sitting and resting. I had about four or five hours of pure calm and comfort. I was just being. It was nice.

Then it was time for Minchah in the little shul on the kibbutz. I got an aliyah, my first in a long time. I was shaking, but I think I did well. It made me feel so fulfilled and accomplished, so proud of myself. One weird thing was wearing sandals to shul. Back in Toronto, that would probably be frowned upon, but in Israel, it's perfectly normal. That's just the way Israelis do things.

On the trip's last day, we went to Independence Hall in Tel Aviv, where David Ben-Gurion declared the independence of the State of Israel upon the ending of the British Mandate on May 14, 1948. We listened to a recording of the declaration, followed by the first public performance of Hatikvah. It was quite moving and brought into focus the importance of Israel to the survival of Jews around the world.

I've had to omit a lot from this account, but the actual events are less important than the overall impression I got. The strangest thing about Israel was how comfortable and safe I felt there. There's this truly penetrating sense of familiarity. It was the first time I'd ever visited, but from the moment I stepped off the plane, it felt like I'd been born there. I'm so grateful to have had this opportunity, and I want to thank all the organizers, bus leaders and the other participants, both Canadian and Israeli – all my new friends. As a disaffected 20-something, I know I should be more cynical about this, but I can't be. In Israel, there was just this instant feeling of unity. It's love. It's home. And I'm going back as soon as I can.

Richard Rosenbaum is a student at the University of Toronto. This article is based on a journal he kept during his Birthright Israel trip last summer.

The global epidemic of Jew hatred

Mikis Theodorakis, the Greek musician who is best known for having crafted the score to Zorba the Greek and perhaps less well-recognized for having composed the Palestinian national anthem, has again shown his stripes as an ardent anti-Zionist. In referring to Israel, he has been quoted as saying that "this small nation is the root of evil." His noxious comments come on the heels of former Malaysian prime minister Mahathir Mohamad's anti-Semitic tirade a few weeks ago and the publication of a recent opinion poll in which 7,000 European respondents identified Israel (ahead of North Korea and Iran) as the single greatest "threat to world peace."

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Moreover, as anti-Jewish invective is translated into heinous action, we have seen, in rapid succession, the destruction by arson of a Jewish school in Paris and the deadly bombing of two synagogues in Istanbul. Israel's foreign minister, Silvan Shalom, has alluded to the likely interconnectedness between the violence in Turkey and the increasingly pervasive "anti-Israel and anti-Jewish incitement in the Arab world," as well as the "anti-Israel and anti-Semitic remarks heard in certain European cities in recent months."

More and more, scholars and analysts are addressing the causes and manifestations of Jew hatred. There are sometimes subtle and sometimes more obvious differences, we are told, between Arab and European variants of anti-Semitism. Even within Europe itself, there are apparent nuances in the expressions of anti-Jewish sentiment – with geo-political and socio-cultural factors driving specific, and not always comparable, agendas in countries such as Germany, France, Russia and Britain.

But whether fuelled by propaganda or the parochial interests of ideologues in Europe or elsewhere, Israel and Zionism are invariably the common denominator in most expressions of modern day anti-Jewish sentiment. In her compelling new book The New Anti-Semitism, Phyllis Chesler draws attention to the forces of anti-colonialism, anti-imperialism, anti-racism and pacifism as major facilitators of today's anti-Semitism. By embracing the tenets of political correctness, the new anti-Semite claims to speak on behalf of all oppressed peoples and thereby weaves a web of lies that is not easily dispelled.

This juggernaut of self-righteous political rectitude, with Jews as its target, is undoubtedly gaining momentum. But it has to be stopped. Through education, prudent advocacy, the cultivation of meaningful alliances outside of our own communities and a variety of other creative strategies, we may at least begin to stop it. In medicine, epidemics are generally best managed when they're caught early and when there is an effective antidote. Let us hope that in dealing with today's global epidemic of anti-Semitism, we are not too late and that we have the right treatment to contain it.

Dealing with the deal

Every Sunday morning, government ministers converge on the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem for the weekly cabinet meeting. Under the watchful eye of journalists and TV cameras, they arrive in state-issued white Volvos, enter the non-descript building, climb a flight of stairs, and do their best to look very serious.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Once the photo-op is over, the 23 ministers meet behind closed doors. The sessions usually last a few hours, during which they tackle issues of state, later providing waiting reporters fresh fodder for the evening news.

Earlier this month, the cabinet endured one of its longest and most emotionally charged debates in recent years. The business at hand: a proposed prisoner swap with the Iranian-backed, Lebanese-based terror group Hezbollah. It was the most anguished meeting of the Sharon government.

The issue is an excruciating one that most countries never have to grapple with. Ministers had to decide whether to accept a German-mediated deal that would gain the freedom of one kidnapped Israeli (Elchanan Tannenbaum) and retrieve the bodies of three Israeli soldiers – Benny Avraham, Adi Avitan and Omar Sawayid – killed by Hezbollah in 2000. In exchange, Israel would pay dearly, releasing 425 Palestinian and Lebanese prisoners. All this without receiving even a shred of information on the fate of missing airman Ron Arad, who was captured in Lebanon in 1986.

After eight hours of intense non-partisan debate and strong pressure from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, the cabinet narrowly approved the swap 12-11. The division among the ministers reflected a similarly charged debate among the public.

There is no debate about the desire to bring home all those held, alive or dead, in Lebanon. Their continued absence gnaws at the hearts of all Israelis, who know it could have been their relatives or friends captured by Hezbollah. Given the deeply rooted Israeli principle of getting all its boys home and the importance attached to the traditional Jewish value of giving each person a proper burial, the prisoner swap is a highly sensitive issue.

The dispute centres on the price and security consequences of this deal. Opponents argue Israel is yielding to extortion that rewards terrorists and will only encourage future kidnappings, and they say that agreeing to such a grossly uneven exchange will boost the standing and strength of Hezbollah in the Arab world. Critics also says that in making such a deal, Israel sends a signal of weakness, and based on past experience, many of those released will carry out murderous attacks against Israelis. Finally, they argue that by including Musafa Dirani, a Lebanese terrorist leader who held Arad for more than a year after his capture, the government is effectively abandoning Arad. (In 1994, Israel seized Dirani to use him as a bargaining chip.) These arguments are not easily dismissed.

Yet there are strong humanitarian factors behind the deal. The pain of the families of Tannebaum and the dead soldiers strongly influenced the ministers.

Nevertheless, the deal is perplexing. The most emotional point concerns Arad. Since his capture 17 years ago, he has become a folk hero to Israelis. His continued absence and unknown fate haunt the nation.

It's surprising the government would accept a deal that doesn't involve Arad. In the late 1980s, he was reportedly transferred to Iranian officials. Hezbollah claims it knows nothing of his whereabouts. Surely Hezbollah leaders could ascertain the fate of Arad with one phone call to their paymasters in Tehran, if doing so was made important enough.

Equally mystifying is the deal's arithmetic. The numbers just don't add up. I've yet to see any explanation of how the two sides arrived at such hugely lopsided terms: Israel frees 425 prisoners (including many terrorists) for one live civilian and three dead soldiers.

True, Israel has made similar outrageously imbalanced prisoner exchanges in the past based on its readiness to sacrifice more than others to obtain the release of its citizens. But how many Israelis were later murdered at the hands of these freed prisoners?

For all the inconsolable grief of the families involved, the government owes it to all Israelis to hang tougher in future negotiations. It's time Hezbollah came clean on the fate of Arad. The cabinet must accept no less. Like all Israelis, I pray he is still alive and will come home soon.

Israel's rightful place among the nations

The recent spate of direct attacks on "Jewish power," including the speech delivered by since-retired Malaysian prime minister Mahathir Mohamad does not, we are told, represent a new form of anti-Semitism. Instead, the hateful rhetoric and the physical attacks against individual Jews and institutions, particularly in Europe, are said to be a reflection of anger at "Israeli aggression."

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In a public opinion poll released earlier this month by the European Union, Europeans named Israel as the greatest threat to world peace – ahead of Iran, Pakistan, and North Korea. In some countries, a significant number of people said Israel does not have the right to exist. But, according to the aforementioned line of thinking, this was a protest, not a manifestation of anti-Semitism.

The same logic is applied in the quick dismissals of television programs based on the Protocols of the Elders of Zion that were broadcast recently on Egyptian and Syrian television and of the regular diet of hate in the Saudi media. According to the apologists, if Israeli "brutality," settlements and occupation ended, the hatred would disappear.

But this effort to distinguish between classical Nazi-style anti-Semitism and the demonization of Israel is artificial. Starting in 1975, when the United Nations adopted its resolution equating Zionism with racism, and continuing in 2001 with the UN's anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, the new Israel-oriented hatred of Jews has grown.

The core of the new anti-Semitism is the attempt to deny the Jewish people the right to a homeland, and to hold Israel to extraordinary standards that make self-defence impossible.

The formula for demonization is quite simple and has not changed since 1948. First, Israel is attacked, whether by conventional armies, missiles, or, more recently, by suicide bombings. Then, Israel is condemned for fighting back, destroying terror networks and building protective barriers. After the Arab invasion during the War of Independence, Israel was (and still is to this day) blamed for the plight of the Palestinian refugees who fled the war's path of destruction.

Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser's explicit threat in 1967 to "push the Jews into the sea" has been forgotten, while the resulting occupation of the West Bank and Gaza is condemned without context. The latest version of this demonization also repeats the totally inappropriate comparison of Israel to the South African apartheid regime.

Whether or not you agree with Israeli responses to aggression and terror, the systematic policy of deliberately ignoring the context that forces Israel to act in its own defence can only be explained as a form of anti-Semitism. The automatic and one-sided condemnations of Israel adopted by the UN and echoed by the thousands of misnamed non-governmental human rights organizations further reflect this moral and ethical breakdown.

Stripped of the apologetic rhetoric, which is sometimes repeated by Jews and Israelis, the new anti-Semitism is based on the effort to deny the Jewish people and culture an independent state like all others. While it is apparently permissible for the French people to have a country where French is the dominant language and French culture is preserved and developed, this is somehow not acceptable for the Jewish people. And the same can be said for Swedes, Norwegians, Spaniards, Egyptians, Chinese and everyone else – except Jews.

According to this illogic, Muslims and Arabs, as well as different Christian denominations, Hindus and many other peoples and cultures are entitled to sovereignty, but for some reason the Jewish people and civilization are subject to a different and unique standard. Many years ago, in a similar vein, British historian Arnold Toynbee called the Jewish people a "fossil civilization."

In recent weeks, however, there have been signs that the new anti-Semitism, in the form of blanket condemnations of Israel, is losing some followers.

Mahathir's comments were widely condemned, even in Europe (after French President Jacques Chirac understood that the old excuses would no longer wash). Official Europe also sought to distance itself from the findings of the EU public opinion poll, recognizing for the first time that the propaganda war against Israel had become anti-Semitic.

There is still a long way to go in this process, but the first step is the most difficult.

Letter from China

Mainland China, though distant from our shores and far removed from everyday Jewish concerns, is inextricably woven into the broad canvas of Jewish history.

Sheldon Kirshner in Beijing

The connection between China and Jews is historic. Jews supposedly ventured into China after the destruction of the first temple in Jerusalem. Thomas Torrance, a Scottish missionary who visited the Ching-Min people of Chengdu in 1918, claimed they were the descendants of the ancient Israelites. Whether he was engaging in fanciful speculation is debatable.

More than 1,000 years ago, however, hardy Jewish merchants from Iran, India and Afghanistan penetrated China, or Cathay as it was then known, via the fabled Silk Road, a trade route linking the Mediterranean basin with central Asia. At the express invitation of a Northern Song dynasty emperor, they established a permanent community in Kaifeng, some 300 kilometres west of Beijing. The Jews of Kaifeng, the subject of Chinese scholarship past and present, were gradually assimilated into Chinese society. Some of their present-day descendants, such as Moshe Zhang Xingwang, are keenly aware and proud of their Jewish ancestry.

A new wave of Jews, mainly from the Middle East, streamed into China in the aftermath of the first Opium War in the 1840s. These Sephardi traders, among them the Sassoons and the Kadoories, settled in, among other cities, Shanghai and Hong Kong.

In the wake of the pogroms that swept czarist Russia in the 1880s, and following the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution, Russian Jews immigrated to Harbin, in the northeast Chinese province of Heilongjiang. There they prospered as shopkeepers, bankers and hoteliers.

With the rise of Nazism, tens of thousands of German and Austrian Jewish refugees flowed into the free port of Shanghai, which did not require visas.

By 1949, the year the People's Republic of China was founded, virtually all the Jews in China had left for greener pastures. Practically the only ones remaining behind were idealists and Sinophiles such as Israel Epstein, who was brought to China from Poland at the age of five and became an official in the new political order, and Sidney Shapiro, a New York lawyer who married a Chinese actress, raised a family and earned a living as a literary translator and occasional actor.

A fresh influx of Jews, largely transient businessmen, arrived in China with the unveiling of far-reaching economic reforms enunciated by Deng Xiaoping in the late 1970s. To cater to their social and religious needs, Chabad Lubavitch opened centres in Beijing, Shanghai and Guangzhou.

Israel, one of the first countries to recognize the People's Republic, forged diplomatic relations with China in 1992 after a period of unofficial contacts. For Israel, and for Jewish businessmen based here, China – the world's most populous country – is a market of infinite possibilities.

Dominated by Western powers in the 19th century, and invaded by Japan in 1931, China is a budding superpower. Not since the Tang dynasty (618-907 C.E.) has China been so prosperous. Admitted into the World Trade Organization two years ago, China's gross domestic product is the sixth largest in the world.

Its red hot economy, which has registered an average annual growth rate of about nine per cent, continues to sizzle as Western investments pour in. A nation that suffered through civil war in the 1930s and 1940s, famine in the 1950s with the disastrous Great Leap Forward and ideological fanaticism during the Cultural Revolution (1966-1970), China today is clearly on the ascendancy.

Poised to become an economic powerhouse, if political stability can be maintained in the face of demands for democracy, China has reinvented and modernized itself in the past 15 years.

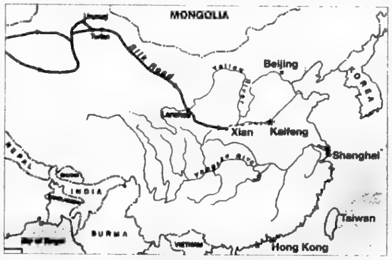
From a country that could barely feed its burgeoning population not so long ago, China has fostered the creation of a fast-growing middle class whose taste for once unattainable Western-style goods seems unquenchable. The requirements of Chinese consumers are being met by a building boom whose towering condominiums bespeak upward mobility and whose gleaming malls, foreign car dealerships, exclusive clubs, sparkling supermarkets, fancy restaurants and chic cafés are the last word in luxury. Goodbye communism, hello capitalism.

And in every large Chinese city, from Shanghai to Zhengzhou, all of which are remarkably clean, the skyline has dramatically been transformed with the proliferation of skyscrapers, museums and concert halls that rival, even surpass, those of New York, Chicago and Toronto in terms of height and avant-garde design.

At night, Chinese cities, much like Hong Kong or Tokyo, pulsate with the flamboyant glow and flicker of a thousand neon lights. And the crowds that descend on congested commercial streets such as Shanghai's Nanjing Road are mind-boggling, as are the monumental traffic jams that clog Beijing, the capital, at almost all hours of the day.

What would Mao Zedong, the guiding light of the People's Republic, think of China's startling capitalistic transformation were he still alive? Mao, whose Little Red Book of aphorisms and philosophical ruminations is widely sold in souvenir shops, mostly as kitsch, would doubtless be shocked by the increasingly yawning gap between rich and poor in China.

Of late, Chinese consumers have bought about one million new cars per year as China's automobile industry has expanded to meet demands. Yet the simple bicycle, the transportation of choice for legions of workers who cannot afford four wheels as yet, is still king throughout China. Whether old, middle-aged or young, they ride their bikes in unhurried, leisurely fashion, waves of sedate cyclists merging with the general hum of traffic, everyone respectful of each other's space.



The fabled Silk Road

China, whose great civilization has beckoned travellers for centuries, has opened itself up not only to Western entrepreneurs, but to foreign tourists as well. There is much to see in this vast, intriguing, dynamic and constantly changing land – from the Forbidden City and the Summer Palace in Beijing and the Great Wall in Badaling to the Bund in Shanghai, the terracotta warriors in Xian and the Dragon Pavilion in Kaifeng. Last winter's SARS epidemic dealt China's tourist industry a stinging blow, and only now is it recovering.

China, which will host the 2008 summer Olympics and the 2010 Expo, is home to a considerable Muslim community, the majority of whose adherents can be found in the far-western province of Xinjiang.

In Kaifeng, and subsequently in Xian, I had my first encounter with Chinese Muslims. Islam, one of China's five state-sanctioned religions, was exported to China by Muslims from the Middle East.

At 4 a.m. in Kaifeng, I was abruptly awakened by a meuzzin's call to prayers, my hotel being right next to a mosque. That afternoon, I visited the mosque, which is attached to a school, and was greeted warmly by a wizened old man wearing a typically white Muslim cap. But I incurred disapproval from two young men when I began flipping through a dog-eared Koran.

Strolling through Xian's teeming Muslim quarter, I ventured into a unique mosque, the world's only one shaped like a Chinese pagoda. I was not the sole Western visitor gazing upon its symmetrical contours.

Later, as I walked through Xian's bazaar, munching a somewhat crispy Chinese pita, I stopped at a shop selling silken scarves. When the elderly Muslim store owner learned I was a Canadian, he beamed, shook my hand and held it in his grasp. Through me, he paid tribute to a revered Canadian in China, the late Dr. Norman Bethune, who laid down his life for the cause of Chinese nationalism.

On one of my last days in Beijing, 24 hours before its earliest snowfall in 20 years, I paid a visit to Mao's mausoleum on Tiananmen Square, the site of a 1989 massacre of pro-democracy students. Along with thousands of Chinese men and women, some bearing bouquets in Mao's honour, I filed somberly past his waxen corpse.

On the morning of my departure from China, after a satisfying two week trip, I met with Eyal Propper – the minister counsellor of the Israeli embassy – at the Beijing Hotel. He and his Israeli colleague, Dan Catarivas, an old China hand who served in China before the establishment of formal diplomatic relations, spoke effusively of China's immense potential as a market for Israel's high-tech exports.

As we talked, I could not help but reflect on the fact that, 1,000 years after Jewish traders reached the Middle Kingdom via the Silk Road and settled in Kaifeng, Jewish businessmen are once again tapping into this immensely rich and promising market.

Israeli journalist slams Sharon's leadership

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon, has failed as a leader, says seasoned Israeli journalist Hirsh Goodman.

"Sharon's leadership at every level has been an abject failure," Goodman declared in a hard-hitting speech at Holy Blossom Temple last week.

Goodman, a senior research associate at Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, was founding editor of the Jerusalem Report and before that a military reporter for the Jerusalem Post.

Hirsh Goodman

He said Sharon has reneged on a 2001 election promise to bring Israelis peace and security.

Describing the Palestinian uprising as "a full-scale war" rather than a revolt, Goodman, a South African native who settled in Israel in 1968, said the conflict has brought immense human suffering and psychological pain to both Israelis and Palestinians.

"I do not remember a period [in Israel] as scary as this," he said, suggesting that the intifadah has caused widespread insecurity and fear throughout the country and resulted in the deaths of some 900 Israelis and more than 2,000 Palestinians since Sept. 2000.

Claiming that Sharon's popularity is slipping, Goodman said the prime minister's only tangible accomplishment has been political survival by keeping his coalition government intact.

Goodman said every diplomatic initiative designed to end the intifadah and restart peace talks has "come to nothing," largely because Sharon does not want to alienate the far-right ministers in his cabinet who oppose territorial concessions.

Israel could have helped former Palestinian prime minister Mahmoud Abbas to consolidate his grip on power by releasing far more prisoners, but Sharon chose not to shore him up, Goodman said.

Sharon "speaks out of both sides of his mouth" by supporting the expansion of settlements while expressing support for peace efforts, he said.

Noting that 56 illegal settlements have been established in the past two years, Goodman said the Israeli army has been diverted from its mission of protecting Israel from terrorism by having to guard these unauthorized outposts.

Referring to a recent incident in the West Bank, he criticized a group of young Israeli settlers who cut down 200 olive trees and thus deprived their Palestinian owners of a livelihood.

Calling the incident a disgrace that besmirches Israel's image and fans anti-Semitism, he accused the Israeli government of paralysis in the face of this provocation.

"We've created a monster," Goodman said of the settlers.

The deliberate placement of Jewish communities in heavily-populated Arab areas in the territories is "meshuge," he said, citing Netzarim in Gaza as an example.

And Israel's recent destruction of three seven-storey apartment buildings in Gaza to avenge the murder of three Israeli soldiers was counter-productive, Goodman said. "Suicide bombers in Gaza are standing in line to volunteer. That's what we've been creating."

He said the Israeli army can't eliminate terrorism because it doesn't know how to fight civilians.

Comparing the mood in Israel today to a boiling pot, Goodman said Israelis are increasingly fed up with Sharon's lack of leadership and direction and his inability to crush terrorism.

Sharon acts as he pleases because the United States is bogged down in Iraq and Israel's opposition parties are impotent, he said.

Calling Israel's security fence through the West Bank an illusion rather than a solution, Goodman said it's no substitution for diplomacy.

Palestinian gunmen will have no difficulty firing rockets and mortars over the fence, which, he said, places almost 200,000 Palestinians on the Israeli side.

The fence's real purpose, Goodman argued, is to emphasize that Sharon has no intention of retreating to pre-1967 borders.

He said the failure of diplomacy is dooming the prospects for a two-state solution and ushering in calls by Palestinian intellectuals for one state. "Their battle cry and strategy will be 'One man, one vote,' and who can oppose that?"

Goodman warned that if this slogan gains international legitimacy, Israel will be put in a very difficult position and may well be branded as an oppressive apartheid state.

In this vein, he said Israel faces a looming demographic crisis, because by 2010, there will be more Arabs than Jews between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea.

Goodman said 70 per cent of Israelis and Palestinians want peace, but their leaders can't deliver a political settlement.

"There is no Ben-Gurion on either side," he lamented, referring to Israel's first prime minister.

Goodman urged Palestinians to rid themselves of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. But he said Israelis cannot blame Arafat for all their current troubles.

Israel needs leadership and vision, Goodman said, "but we're not getting it."

Effects of Rabin's death continue today: Israel's consul general

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Yitzhak Rabin fought in many battles, but even in the constant face of death, the sanctity of life was paramount to him, a memorial to the slain Israeli prime minister heard last week

Israel's consul general in Toronto, Ya'acov Brosh, said his murder and the strife that has lingered since speak volumes about the need to value life the way he did.

"The only lesson that we might learn [from his murder] is that no matter what terrible internal struggles we should face in the coming future, we should never, ever raise a hand against each other," Brosh said.

"The value of human life is above everything."

As part of the Nov. 15 ceremony at the Lodzer Centre Congregation – marking eight years since Rabin's assassination – teens from eight different Jewish youth movements joined in singing harmonies and reading excerpts from speeches made by and about Rabin.

Yitzhak Rabin

"We are in the midst of building the peace… layer by layer, brick by brick," Rabin was quoted as saying at Oslo in 1994, where the foundation for Israel's peace accords with the Palestinians were laid. "We are determined to do the job well."

The teens lit a series of candles that illuminated a striking poster of Rabin, the first Jewish political leader to be assassinated by a Jew in 2,500 years.

Brosh said the reverberations of the murder continue to be felt in Israel.

"I don't know if Israel has ever recovered since the killing," he said. "[Rabin] represented real hope and faith… and many people who did not agree with him [still] admired his way."

In speaking of Rabin's character, Brosh said that in 1994 when the Jewish extremist Baruch Goldstein killed 27 Palestinians at a Hebron mosque, Rabin not only condemned the act, he also expressed his personal sorrow.

"I am ashamed as a Jew, as an Israeli and as a human being," Rabin said at the time.

Born in Jerusalem in 1922, Rabin graduated from agricultural school before embarking on a decorated 27-year military career, first in the pre-state Haganah and then in the Israel Defence Forces, that was capped by his stint as IDF chief of staff during the Six Day War in 1967.

After the war, Rabin was Israel's ambassador to the United States until 1973. He served as prime minister from 1974 to 1977.

The Labor MK then served in various high-ranking government portfolios, including as Minister of Defence.

He was elected prime minister once again in 1992, starting a historic term in which he signed the Israel-Palestinian Declaration of Principles in 1993 and a peace deal with Jordan in 1994. For his efforts, he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1994, along with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and Labour MK Shimon Peres.

On Nov, 1995, after a rally for peace whose theme was "Yes to Peace, No to Violence," Rabin was assassinated by a young Jewish extremist.

Channa Pinchasi, the representative from the Jewish Agency to the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, told the members of the Jewish youth groups that their participation signified their support for Israel.

"I salute Toronto's youth… for promoting our common goal for a Jewish and democratic state of Israel," she said. "Your presence here is a strong statement expressing your unending support."

The ceremony concluded with the teens singing Shir Hashalom.

Lost Holocaust music to be performed in Toronto

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

In the early 1920s, Erwin Schulhoff began creating jazz-inspired compositions, integrating new syncopated rhythms with more traditional classical sounds.

By the time the Holocaust caught up with the Prague-born musician in 1941, he had created and produced symphonies, concerti, chamber music and an opera called The Flames. That June, he was imprisoned the Wulzburg concentration camp in Bavaria, where he died of tuberculosis.

While works by Schulhoff and others such as Hans Krasa, creator of the children's opera Brundibar, were performed before or during the war, other pieces were discovered later, often by chance.

Paul Schoenfield

On the weekend beginning Dec. 5, music by Schulhoff, Krasa and other artists will be performed, some for the first time in North America, in a three-day festival on music related to the Holocaust called Music Reborn.

The music, which will be performed by Artists of the Royal Conservatory of Music (ARC) and students of the Glenn Gould Music School, will not only reflect the wealth of repertoire written at that time, but will also explore how the Holocaust affects our musical perceptions generally, said ARC's musical director Simon Wynberg.

When music is heard through the lens of the Shoah, the listener is often affected by the knowledge of the horrors that took place, Wynberg said.

Pieces that were written before the Holocaust, such as Sergei Prokofiev's Overture on Hebrew Themes, are received very differently now than when it was first heard by a New York audience in 1910, he said.

Interestingly, much of the music composed by Jewish musicians during the war is light and witty.

As an example, Wynberg pointed to Buds, a piece by Karel Berman, which is very innocent and has no reference to his Theresienstadt experience. The irony of these types of works, which were probably created to help the artists escape the horrors of their environment, is not lost on the listener, he said.

After the war, the hopelessness of the Holocaust began to inform compositions and more ominous, sinister elements emerged, Wynberg said.

Camp Songs by American composer Paul Schoenfield was written after the war and "is a very different type of remembrance piece," he said. The lively music, which incorporates tangos and dance melodies, is coupled with the solemn lyrics of Aleksander Kulisiewiz, a non-Jewish political prisoner who spent six years in the Sachsenhausen concentration camp.

"The poems describe the horrors of the camp with a sarcastic, graphic and vengeful honesty that draws us in as observers to bear witness to the terror," Wynberg said.

The weekend event will include the North American premier of a piano concerto by Szymon Laks, who was the conductor of one of the orchestras at Auschwitz.

The event will also include lectures by several writers and academics including one by Gottfried Wagner, the great-grandson of operatic composer Richard Wagner, known for his anti-Semitic views.

While Gottfried was born after the end of the war in 1947, he grew up on stories about his family legacy and their close friendship with "Uncle Wolf," a man the rest of the world referred to as Adolf Hitler. Over the years, Gottfried separated himself from his family and began to confront his past and the role Germans played during the Holocaust.

He published a book titled Twilights of the Wagners: The Unveiling of a Family's Legacy, and has dedicated himself to the pursuit of German Jewish reconciliation, establishing the Post-Holocaust Dialogue Group.

Also at the event, Bret Werb, resident musicologist at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., will discuss the work of Aleksander Kulisiewicz, author of the texts used in Schoenfield's Camp Songs, and York University history professor Michael Kater will talk on "Jewish Musicians and the Music in Nazi Germany and Beyond."

Special guests will include mezzo-soprano Kimberley Barber, bass-baritone Thomas Goerz, bassist Robert Pomakov and violist Rennie Rehehr.

Wynberg said that ARC, a musical ensemble made up of senior RCM faculty, was established to produce educational, as well as entertaining, concerts.

"The music chosen for the weekend has survived not simply because of its connection to the Holocaust," he said.

"In a few hundred years, when the Holocaust is a little less real than it is today, this music will still be there because it is simply good music."

University paper pulled after anti-Semitic comment

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Copies of The Gargoyle, the bi-weekly student-run newspaper of University College at the University of Toronto, were pulled off newsstands last Friday after an anti-Semitic note by the editors appeared in the Nov. 21 edition.

The comment, which stated "…shut the fuck up, you stupid greedy Jew," was written following an article by Josh Lieblein criticizing a cartoon that appeared in the previous paper.

Part of a series called "Adventures in Objectivism," the cartoon showed two men "poking their heads out," Lieblein said, with one of them carrying a bag of money and wearing a black hat and sideburns. He questioned whether the artist had meant to intentionally portray the character as a Jewish Shylock.

The editorial note defended the cartoon and concluded with the anti-Semitic slur. It said the drawing was made by "a 19th-century British guy with mutton chops."

The university responded to complaints immediately after Hillel public relations co-ordinator Johanna Herman and Hillel executive member Elanna Mosoff noticed the comment when they picked up the paper on Friday.

Principal of University College Paul Perron met the same day with members of the Hillel student executive board, director of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life Lisa Isen Baumal, and the executive members of University College's literacy and athletic society. It was decided that publication of The Gargoyle would halt until the editorial policies of the newspaper could be reviewed.

Hillel has demanded that the editorial board resign, but no decision has yet been made.

Jewish soldier remembers his fallen comrades

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Cpl. Dan Matthews just wants to move on.

He needs time to heal, to reflect and ultimately, to put behind him the horrible events of Oct. 2, when a vehicle in a convoy he was riding in hit a landmine near the Canadian base in Afghanistan, killing two soldiers and wounding three others.

Only Matthews, one of two known Jewish soldiers serving in Afghanistan, escaped without a scratch. He'd rather forget the incident, but he will never forget his fallen comrades.

The 32-year-old Toronto native, a signaller with the 3rd Battalion Royal Canadian Regiment Para Company, was sent home for two weeks after the blast to be with his wife and young son, then returned to his duties at Camp Julien, the Canadian base in southwest Kabul.

Matthews, who has been in Afghanistan for four months, politely turned aside questions about the incident in an e-mail interview.

"I would like to move on with my healing and remember my friends the way I knew them, not the way I saw them," he wrote.

On that terrible day, Sgt. Robert Short and Cpl. Robbie Beerenfenger were killed when their Iltis jeep, just 20 metres ahead of the vehicle in which Matthews was riding, hit a landmine while on a routine off-road patrol in the foothills southwest of the Canadian base.

Three other soldiers were wounded, including two in the front seat of Matthews' jeep. But Matthews was unscathed because he was facing backwards in the rear seat.

Matthews made a brave but futile effort to help his fellow soldiers. The deaths stunned the nation.

In the days following, he wrestled with overwhelming guilt and convalesced at home. In time, he attributed his fate not to sheer luck, but to his mother, who died when Matthews was 15.

"Well, let's just say I feel I had a guardian watching over me that day," he says, "and I like to think it was her."

Asked how the incident affected his outlook on life, Matthews replied, "in a year or so, I'll be able to answer that better."

As for the Canadian Forces, which Matthews joined nearly seven years ago, "I feel even [more] strongly that we are doing the right thing being here because when I see a small child with a smile, I like to think that Sgt. Short and Cpl. Beerenfenger were able to give that child a chance to smile."

Matthews, who attended Shaarei Beth El congregation in Oakville while growing up, knows of just one other Canadian Jewish soldier serving in Afghanistan, someone at Kabul Multinational Brigade headquarters, and the two speak regularly.

Matthews, who uses the camp chapel for prayer, says he's free to practise his religion in Afghanistan. "It is like being a Jew back in Canada, just everyone wears combat uniforms."

Jewish Life

Where do you get your water?

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

Rabbinic Reflections

Isaac dug anew the wells of his father Abraham. Wells are one of three basic ways Middle Easterners obtain water. One way is to go down to rivers and lakes to draw water. The second method is to dig a pit and plaster it, thus making a cistern, a miniature lake from which water can be drawn as necessary. Rain water flows towards the cistern and is trapped for future use. Finally, people can dig a well and tap the water table.

These three means of obtaining water remind us of three different ways of living.

Like the people who go down to the river to draw water, some live by the flow of life around them, making no effort to go deeper or seek more permanent sources of inspiration or connection. A person can live like this most of their days without difficulty.

Those who use the river and lake discover, however, that in the severest seasons of heat, their resources are challenged. Lacking any other basis of survival, they may either die of thirst or be forced to submit to the will of those who control other water supplies.

Similarly, people who take inspiration from the daily flow of events – from business, fashion, sport and the surface relations they have with individuals – may find that when life gets tough, they lack the resources to withstand their trials. That's when they turn to other sources of inspiration, and since their hour of need may produce unwise decisions, they might pay exorbitantly for their choice. Most of us are of this type of person.

The second source of water echoes another kind of person, the one who builds a cistern – a collector of water to be used in the dry season. These days, when we find life's road bumpy, we often head for advice to the bookstore or library, or perhaps to an advisor, professor or clergy person. These are our cisterns, for they gather knowledge and concentrate it in one spot.

If you want to meet a troubled person, go to the nearest cistern: the self-help section of the bookstore. There, you'll find people searching for the volume with the solution to their unique problem.

Those who use cisterns must understand how to use them, and they must also understand that these cisterns must be maintained. A cistern requires a liner of plaster to retain water. Likewise, a bookstore cannot exist without customers, a library without a tax base, an advisor without a fee, the professor or clergy person without the institution that sustains them. Just as people must tend to their cisterns, particularly when the water level becomes low, so in the most difficult of times is it necessary to maintain the institutions of learning and wisdom in our society.

Finally, there is the well. A well taps the water table, that ancient source of water that the earth itself has filtered and purified. In times when we're desperate for water, we go to the extra expense and difficulty of digging deep in the hope of finding life-giving, fresh water. Similarly, when survival matters most, we dig deepest for our inspiration.

This can be seen in the way we use our tradition of Torah. During ordinary times, we skim the surface. In harder times, we open our library of books for commentary and inspiration. In the most critical of moments, we do not abandon Torah, but we dig deeper and deeper for meaning until at last a fresh, life-giving interpretation emerges that inspires us to go forward again.

When biblical religion could not answer questions of the day, the oral tradition – first codified in the Mishnah – emerged. When Mishnah could not cope with new problems, we dug deeper and found Gemarah. When Gemarah lacked answers to certain contemporary questions, the academies advanced with takkanot, general decrees, and with simplified codes of law. When these codes failed to inspire in the face of dispersion, kabbalah developed. Since then, the old prophets have re-inspired us with their ethical imperatives.

Every few generations, we need to dig new wells or uncover old ones, as Isaac did long ago. Individually, we may need to refresh and drink from deeply filtered waters of inspiration that we have not touched before, but we must know that an effort – a personal effort – is required to dig so deeply.

Each of these three sources of water, the natural stream, the cistern and the well has its time and place, and each also speaks of how we live our lives. Are you drinking from a stream, a cistern or a well? Is it the right source for you? Something to ponder.

Stoned and cast out

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Like one of those Dr. Seuss learning-to-read sequences, an undeniable and consistent picture has taken shape in our modern world.

Teenagers take drugs.

Jewish teenagers take drugs.

Secular Jewish teenagers take drugs.

Orthodox Jewish teenagers take drugs.

And unlike former U.S. president Bill Clinton, our kids do, in fact, inhale. They get stoned in basements, cars, parking lots, parks (I can smell it when I'm jogging), washrooms, street corners, at friends' houses, at parties, alone, in pairs, in groups, at concerts, with headphones on, with kippot off, as an act of belonging, as an anti-social statement, because they like it, because they're afraid not to like it, to combat depression, to combat boredom, to combat nothing at all, monthly, weekly, daily, as an adjunct to sex, with ascetic purity, to defy their parents, to copy their parents, with giggling followed by hunger, with calm followed by melancholy, with fear, for money, for free, with recklessness, with indifference, with anger, with sweetness, with clarity, and with confusion.

As hackneyed as it sounds, every child is different, so, by extension, every child who has smoked a joint has a different story. Some are perfectly in-control children who will doubtless graduate high school and go on to fulfill their parents' dream of medical school and a materially prosperous future. They smoked some doobies. No big deal. They're too smart to throw out their lives on drugs. But for the child who is invested in getting high and the rest of their day is pretty much an asterisk, it doesn't take a Freud to see their are some underlying issues.

My experience of Jewish communities in this regard is, to be euphemistic, disappointing, and this is especially true of the Orthodox population, which I am quite familiar with. Kids are given a ubiquitous label – "teens at risk" – and then are socially exiled as the "problem child." It's hard to address what you would rather not believe, and Orthodox kehillot have denial to burn when it comes to believing there are children who are angry at Judaism, disgusted with their parents and feeling contempt for their teachers and communal leaders, who they feel have betrayed the spirit of compassion and sophisticated empathy.

Whether such a perception is accurate or paranoid or many shades in between is less relevant than finding a way to approach these children with honesty and respect. Instead, these young people are often treated as if they are contemporary lepers – a dangerous contagion to be thrust "outside the camp," lest the disease spread.

Love your neighbour as yourself is a fairly empty platitude if it is not applied to those outside our circle of agreement and social tolerance. As Rav Abraham Isaac Kook writes, "Loving the Jewish people and labouring to defend them, both collectively and individually, is not just an emotional task. It is an important discipline in the Torah. It is a deep and broad science with many branches."

When we don't believe in others, is it their characters that are deficient, or our faith?

Thoughts on Jewish Book Month

Books

Bernard Baskin

Every year, worldwide, about 70,000 books are published in English. A small portion of these come under the heading of literature. How many of these are good books? How many are of enduring value? What follows are some broad and general criteria.

In the first place, good books do not end with the reading of them. Something remains of intellectual or spiritual or esthetic value, something that will advance the culture of our souls and something that will augment us. In a word then, the first thing a book should do is to provide a dilation of the spirit, a stretch of the imagination, a view of new horizons.

In the second place, a good book should interpret and explain what we ourselves, unaided, would find difficult to understand or appreciate. A great writer will shed light and irradiate the dark corners of human personality and relationships. He or she can help us to understand ourselves and our own problems more clearly by unfolding for us the life and problems of other people. How did they stand up to the shocks of life? What trials and tribulations and temptations were theirs? How did they grow or fail to grow because of them?

In good books then, something of ourselves will always appear, something of our own confusion or weakness. They may even awaken within us thoughts that we feared to acknowledge to ourselves. They will reach down to the very source of our being.

In the third place, good books should not only set us thinking, but should challenge us to action. As we read ourselves into them, we unconsciously recreate ourselves. We are startled into a new awareness and we want to do something about it. To a certain degree, then, literature remakes, redirects and activates us.

All books communicate a selection of judgments about life. All books try to teach. The essential differences are between those books that teach well and those that teach badly, between those that teach valuable things and those that teach foolish or trivial things.

Finally, good books deal not just with surface truth but with what we might call poetic truth. They reveal that often behind things as they are there is another truth, a different reality, other possibilities. They open up a world of wonder.

The fact that such truth cannot be proved in the scientific sense does not render it invalid. On the contrary, it is essential to our sanity and well-being. It is indeed a "furtherance of life," a going forward to meet life, not a pleasant escape from it or a holiday from the limitations of time and space and respectability.

Perhaps it all comes down to these words of Aldous Huxley: "Those who know how to read have it in their power to magnify themselves, to multiply the ways in which they exist, to make their lives fully significant and exciting."

Sheva Brachot on the World Wide Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

"May there soon be heard, Lord our God, in the cities of Judea and in the streets of Jerusalem, the sound of joy and the sound of celebration, the voice of a bridegroom and the voice of a bride, the happy shouting of bridegrooms from their weddings and of young men from their feasts of song." –From the Sheva Brachot, the Jewish wedding blessings. [http://www.ou.org/wedding/7brachot.htm]

The Sheva Brachot (Seven Blessings) are among the most joyous and beautiful blessings in Judaism. Recited under the chupah and over festive meals during the first week of marriage, they represent the happiness not only of the couple, but of the entire community. Today, a look at Sheva Brachot insights and resources on the World Wide Web.

The roots for the Sheva Brachot tradition can be traced back to biblical times. After Laban tricked Jacob into marrying Leah instead of Rachel, the father-in-law Laban commanded Jacob to "wait until this week [of wedding celebrations] for [Leah] is over. Then we will give you the other girl." (Genesis 29:27) [http://makeashorterlink.com/?X1D941746]

The ceremony is also mentioned in the Talmud, by the Ramban and in the Shulchan Aruch, the Code of Jewish Law. But as Herb Geduld writes in the Cleveland Jewish News, since the festive meal was eaten only in the presence of 10 men, "it was not a widespread ceremony in eastern Europe, where feeding 10 or 20 people was often an unaffordable expense." The week-long practice only regained wide popularity in the past 50 years. Geduld tells the story of a couple in 1960 who planned to celebrate their Sheva Brachot aboard an El Al plane. But when a crowd congregated in the rear of the old Britannia Jet-Prop, the plane became unbalanced and they all had to return to their seats. The festivities continued after the couple arrived in London. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?C21A52746]

The seven blessings are recited under the chupah and at the conclusion of each of the week-long festive meals. If you are going to be honoured with reciting one of the blessings, you can practise your rendition at Paul Evans and Rebecca Schwartz's Sheva Brachot Page. Each blessing is presented in Hebrew, English transliteration and English translation, along with an audio file of the traditional melody. While you're at the site, take a look at Rebecca and Paul's July wedding. [http://www.bexandpaul.com/Wedding/Sheva/]

There are several interesting laws and customs connected to the Sheva Brachot. For example, Rabbi Doniel Neustadt explains that one of the participants at the celebration should be a "panim chadashot" – literally "a new face" – someone who was not present at the wedding ceremony. [http://www.torah.org/advanced/weekly-halacha/5760/vayechi.html] Rabbi Neustadt notes that the first week of marriage is considered a "private Yom Tov" during which there is an obligation of simchah. [http://www.torah.org/advanced/weekly-halacha/5760/mikeitz.html] For more details, check out Rabbi Eliezer Chrysler's Daf Yomi quiz. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?A22B13746]

Couples who decide to observe the traditional week of Sheva Brachot should expect to see plenty of family, friends, meals and public celebrations. It also means postponing thoughts of escaping to a private honeymoon. And that's a good thing, says author Michael Medved in his article "Banish the Honeymoon."

"Consider the underlying message that the honeymoon habit conveys. Even when the bridal pair is fortunate enough to enjoy a very public wedding ceremony, they follow this occasion with an abrupt escape from the very community that helped them consecrate their vows." Medved acknowledges that seven days of feasting with friends may sound like an ordeal but it really isn't. He says we should take a look at the "synthetic and temporary environment of the honeymoon" compared to the grounding that a ritual like the Sheva Brachot gives us. [http://www.taemag.com/issues/articleid.163 50/article_detail.asp]

Gilah Langner continues that theme and makes a lovely observation when she describes the conclusion of the Sheva Brachot ceremony. [http://www.kerem.com/journals/journal3.htm] Wine is poured from two cups into a third and then back into the original cups. "The newlyweds sip from the wine and share the third cup with their guests. The Sheva Brachot ritual thus extends the sense of blessing expressed in the words just recited… The couple's joy reverberates through the community."

Rubinsteins keep Israel all in the family

By ADI NEUBERGER
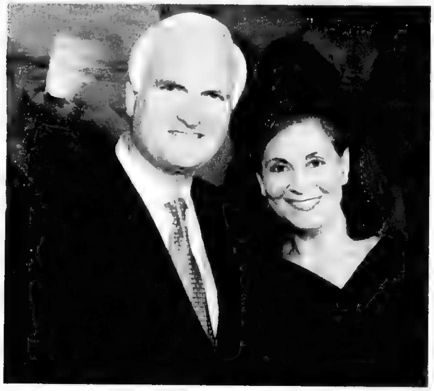
Special to The CJN

In the Rubinstein household, ahavat Yisrael is a family affair.

"A strong connection to Israel is all part of growing up Jewish in our home", says Renee Rubinstein, who along with her husband Eli, is being honoured by the Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner on Nov. 30.

Both Renee and Eli are children of Holocaust survivors. Eli, who was born in an Italian displaced persons camp just months before the War of Independence, would have gone to Israel with his parents, Bill and Judith, if not for a law that prevented people with small children from immigrating to the new Jewish homeland.



Eli and Renee Rubinstein

His parents decided to start their new lives in Canada instead. "If I hadn't come along at that time, my parents would have gone to Israel. Instead, Israel is now my second home," says Eli.

The two met in New York, where Renee was born and raised.

Eli, a philosophy student at the University of Toronto was visiting with his professor and good friend Emil Fackenheim. Shortly afterwards, Renee moved to Toronto and the two married in 1974.

After their first child was born, their love of the Jewish state served as the impetus for their growing community involvement. This dedication and commitment flowed through to their children as the family grew.

"It was a natural thing to do," says Renee, who has volunteered for numerous causes here and in Israel over the last 30 years including the Israel Biotechnical Institute, Emunah Women of Toronto, Canadian Friends of Shaarei Tzedek Hospital, the Hebrew Academy for Special Children, and the Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem, where she served as president for over a decade.

After leaving his career as lecturer in religious studies at the University of Toronto, Eli took his place in the family-owned business, H&R Developments.

He dedicated himself to many organizations over the years: Bnei Akivah Schools in Toronto, the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce and Industry, the Canadian Jewish Congress and Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University, which he serves as president.

"Our children have surpassed our connection to Israel," says Renee.

Their eldest daughter Tamar, lives in Raanana with her husband Jonathan Koschitzky and their four children; their son Ilan, whose wife is Israeli born, and Erez, 22, now pursuing a post graduate degree at New York University, spent a number of years studying in Israel; and their youngest daughter Hadassa, spent last summer visiting Israel and Ukraine and plans to return to Israel to study next year.

Although Renee admits it is sometimes difficult to have her children in Israel during unsettling times, frequent visits and telephone conversations ease her mind. "I wouldn't have it any other way," she says.

Both Renee and Eli hope their whole family will be on hand to celebrate the opening of a new park and playground in one of Tel Aviv's poorest neighbourhoods, B'nei Brak.

The Orthodox neighbourhood, with a large number of children, has almost nothing in the way of recreational facilities. The Rubensteins plan to change that with funds raised at this year's Negev Dinner, which will be held at the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

At this year's dinner, a new award will be presented to Maurice Benzacar, Alex Eisen, Frances Mandell-Arad, Michael Rosenberg and Rose Ziner, who are all being honoured for their involvement in the community.

For information on the dinner, to be held at the Sheraton Centre Hotel, call 416-638-7200.

Bereaved Jewish Families launch Web site

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Bereaved Jewish Families of Ontario, a support group for Jewish parents who have lost a child through death, recently launched its first Web site.

By logging onto www.bereavedjewishfamilies.on.ca, parents can find information on the group's activities as well as on Jewish rituals and on such things as handling holidays and special days after the death of a child.

There is also a list of resource books, a place to share thoughts with other parents and links to other organizations.

The group, which was formed in 1989 with eight newly bereaved parents, believes that early intervention and assistance can facilitate healing, and that the support that comes from the group can alleviate the aloneness that bereaved parents often experience after the loss of a child.

Anne Isenberg, whose son Darrell, 20, was killed in a car accident 11 years ago, says the Web site provides a place for people to turn to when they don't know where to go.

"Losing a child is not that common, and people often feel alone. The site allows them to reach out and find some comfort," says Isenberg, who has two other children and three grandchildren.

The grief of losing a child is always with you, she says.

"Grief is grief, no matter where you live, and the Web site provides people with a place to reach others they may not normally meet. We are working on a chat room which should be up and running soon."

It is a good outlet for parents who may not yet feel ready to talk to anyone in person or by phone, Isenberg says.

"People may feel freer to talk online. They can log on without having to pick up the phone. The organization does not do outreach. Parents have to call Bereaved Parents when they feel ready."

Isenberg first approached the organization when she needed help handling her daughter's marriage.

"It was the birth of my grandchildren, especially the first one Daniel, named after my son, who really turned the tide and brought some measure of joy back into our lives.

"I was told by a grief expert that you know you are healing when the joy outweighs the pain at special events, and that was the first time that the joy really outweighed the pain," she says.

Bereaved Jewish Families Ontario has also started a support group that is run by social worker Marcie Wargon and takes place on the last Tuesday of every month at the Lipa Green Building.

For more information, call 416-638-7800, ext. 202, or e-mail support@bereavedjewishfamilies.on.ca.

Humanism can help to end Arab-Israeli conflict: educator

By ADI NEUBERGER
Special to The CJN

Religious tolerance, racism and land rights are perceived by many to be at the centre of the Arab-Israeli conflict. But if trying to foster understanding along these lines has yielded relatively little progress, could it be time for a new approach, one that places the combatants on common ground?

The answer is "yes," said Deborah Weissman, director of Jerusalem's Kerem Institute for Teacher Training for Humanistic-Jewish Education, in a Nov. 16 lecture at York University titled "Educating Towards Humanism and Judaism in Israel Today." Her talk was part of the Harry Crowe Lecture series at York's Centre for Jewish Studies.

Weissman said both Jews and Arabs have a lot to learn from humanism, which she defined as a philosophical system that considers people to be basically good and rational creatures who can improve themselves and others through their natural human attributes of reason and action.

"Seeing others as human is the first step to a more empathetic relationship between Arabs and Jews," she said.

As an example of humanism at work in Israel, Weissman cited haredi Jews who weave humanism into their beliefs and practices.

"In the past two years, there has been an amazing development among haredim," she said, referring to the yellow-vested members of Zaka who attend to victims of suicide bombings.

"They used to only help themselves, [but] now they're helping other Jews as well as Arabs. Terror has become the great leveller in Israeli society."

As a result, although "most people think of humanism as anti-religion…we don't have that association in Israel," said Weissman, who is Orthodox but also considers herself a humanist.

Indeed, she contended, "there is no contradiction between humanism and being a religious Jew."

In fact, she argued, Israeli society, with its Jewish majority, is ripe for adopting a humanistic approach such as the one put forward by Rabbi Shimshon Raphael Hirsch, the 19th-century founder of neo-Orthodoxy (later called modern Orthodoxy), in which Torah study is coupled with secular learning under the slogan "Torah im derech eretz."

"[Rabbi] Hirsh provided a model of how one can live as religious Jews in the modern world and incorporate western values into the study of Torah," Weissman said. "Were it not for him, we would not have Jewish girls learning Torah and Orthodox men serving in the Israel Defence Forces."

Weismann said the Kerem Institute, which she has headed for the last nine years, is another example of humanism taking root in Israel.

All its students pursue bachelor of arts degrees at Hebrew University while studying in the institute's Jewish education program.

They also represent a wide range of religious observance and political views.

"We have students who live in West Bank settlements learning side by side with others who won't even set foot in a settlement." Weissman said.

She said humanistic education is not only important for Jews to be able to relate to one another, it's also key to establishing equal ground for Jews and Muslims to work out their differences.

"Whether we are Jews, Muslims or Christians, we learn more about ourselves by learning more about the religion of others."

For example, "it's amazing how similar Arabic and Hebrew are," she said.

"Our only hope for survival is if serious Muslims integrate some humanism into their own faith – a kind of 'Koran im derech eretz.'"

Harbord class of '53 gathers for 50th reunion

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Many graduates of Harbord Collegiate Institute, once the centre of activities for Jewish teens in Toronto, have wonderful memories of their time at the school.

The graduating class of 1953 recently held its 50th reunion dinner at Meron Banquet Hall, where 88 graduates, spouses and partners gathered, from places as far away as Kingston and Parry Sound in Ontario, and cities in Alabama and Arizona.

The invocation was given by accountant Irwin Talesnick, who presented a non-denominational prayer that encompassed the various ethnic and religious affiliations of those who attended the reunion.

"It was an amazing experience to see people, some of whom I have not seen in 50 years, even though we have spent our lives in the same city," said architect Marty Poizner, who spearheaded the organization of the reunion.

"Some faces have changed. Most hairlines and waistlines have changed, but the personalities haven't." He added that the members of the organizing committee met half a dozen times to plan the event, "and we had great fun."

On a sadder note, psychologist Harvey Silver, who was MC, noted that 20 students and most of their teachers had died.

He introduced their Latin teacher, Elizabeth Staples (now Vowles). He said that this had been her first teaching job, "and many of the boys had a crush on her. To me, she was the equivalent of Doris Day. Miss Staples went on to teach at the Associated Hebrew Schools."

In introducing Staples, he said, "You may be shorter and heavier, but you still have the sparkle and enthusiasm and caring for people."

Silver spoke about the economic and geographic reasons for choosing Harbord and said, "Looking back, it is more the attitudes than the aptitudes that determine the altitude of our success."

Throughout the evening, people told stories about the highlights of their years at Harbord.

They spoke of the school strike after the principal decided that the speeches for the student council elections were offensive to him and he cancelled the council. The newspapers were called, the principal recanted and the student council was reinstated.

Tom Alderman, a journalist for CBC radio and television and a featured writer, spoke of the students betting on the races at school.

Alderman was called "The Commissioner of Racing" and co-ordinated the betting for the races to take place that afternoon at Woodbine Race Track. The newspapers sensationalized this story and the gambling was brought to a halt.

Some graduates recalled that the State of Israel was declared when they were students in Grade 9. The school orchestra and the students marched down University Avenue to join the celebration at Maple Leaf Gardens.

During the dinner, graduates were given their graduation pictures with the comments that were in the 1953 yearbook. At each table, the graduates read the comments and then spoke about some of the things that have happened in their lives in the 50 years since they left the school.

Speakers also recalled the sold-out Gilbert and Sullivan productions, their winning basketball teams and the Arthur Murray dance lessons which, Silver said, "taught awkward teenagers like me to box step, something I remember to this day."

There was much camaraderie and story swapping and Silver concluded his speech with: "The past is history, the future is a mystery, the present is a gift. Please enjoy tonight and for the rest of your life."

He told The CJN that many of those present do not want to wait another 50 years to meet again. "They are planning to have a follow-up reunion in five years."

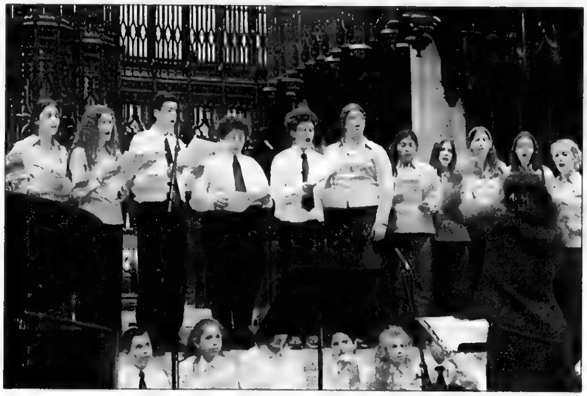
Renanim choirs move to Beth David

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter



The Renanim Youth Singers and the Renanim Children's Chorus perform at community events throughout the year.

The Renanim Youth Singers and The Renanim Children's Chorus, founded and directed by Susan Michaels, have recently relocated to Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

The choirs are now in their fifth year and accept youth from ages 9 to 19, who must audition.

Michaels, a music educator who has directed the Scarborough Wind Ensemble and is a past member of the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir, says she started the choirs because "there is a need for a [place] in the Jewish community where talented kids can perform in a group in which they take pride, while they explore and develop their potential.

"The Jewish community has a rich cultural heritage, and it is being lost to pop culture. Kids today do not have a good sense of who they are culturally."

Choir members come from at least seven Jewish day schools, as well as from public and other private schools, Michaels says, "so it enables youth from all denominational backgrounds to come together in song."

The groups have performed for UJA Federation Women's Campaign installations, Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations, Beit Halochem Aid to Disabled Veterans Israel gala programs, and at a 9/11 memorial program.

Most recently, the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto had the choirs perform at its opening program for Holocaust Education Week.

Michaels says she goes through hundreds of musical pieces before choosing the groups' repertoire.

"I pick music that I think will inspire the kids, and they usually come to choir practice saying they've been singing the music all week. I never have to tell them to practise.

"The music elevates all of us. We may come to practice – each choir practises two hours a week – exhausted, but we always come away energized," she says.

"The practices are highly disciplined, and I push the kids hard," Michaels says, "but there is also a lot of laughter. The choir members learn to find their musical voice in an appropriate way.

"Good quality music hits you in the soul, and we try to pull out the emotions from every piece of music. We're always working on the emotional elements that we are trying to communicate to our audience.

"I've found that the higher I make my expectations, the harder the kids work. I notice a quantum leap from week to week," she says.

The Jewish community needs a musical voice, and the kids need a voice to express their feelings about being Jewish, she says, "We always get standing ovations at our concerts, and sometimes the audience is driven to tears. That's what makes the choirs exciting."

To arrange an audition, call Michaels at 416-449-2296.

Newmans to be honoured at NCSY concert

National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) is honouring Zale and Rochel Newman with the National Business Leadership Award at its 23rd annual concert, Dec. 8 at Roy Thomson Hall.

Rabbi Glenn Black, regional director of NCSY, says the Newmans are being honoured for the more than three decades they have devoted to NCSY's extensive youth outreach.

He said that in January, the Newmans are moving to New York, where Zale, who has produced the concert for the past 20 years, will take over as national director of NCSY, the youth arm of the Orthodox Union (OU).

The concert will feature Avraham Fried and Dedi, together with Yehuda and other surprise guests, said Rabbi Black.

A fundraising dinner is being held before the concert to help finance NCSY's expanding catalogue of programs including Torah High, a Jewish learning program providing Ontario Ministry of Education credits; Jewish culture clubs in public high schools; drop-in centres; Shabbaton week-ends; and structured trips to other cities.

"There could not be a better venue to honour Zale and Rochel. Jewish music and Jewish teenagers are at the centre of their lives.

"Zale was the inspiration behind, and among the creators of, a Jewish music phenomenon known as Uncle Moishy and the Mitzvah Men, which recorded dozens of songs that Jewish children are still singing today. He was also record producer for Shlomo Carlebach," said Rabbi Black.

Newman's primary objective in his new role, said Rabbi Black, is to expand the number of teenagers influenced by the organization through more extensive research, greater use of the Internet and innovative outreach technique."

Bar mitzvah a walk down memory lane for family

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The former Anshei Ostrovtzer Synagogue, now the Cecil Community Centre, was sold to the City of Toronto in the 1960s.

Nathan Friedman-Burley's bar mitzvah was a walk down memory lane for his family.

The event took place at the Cecil Community Centre at 58 Cecil St. in downtown Toronto, once the home of the vibrant Anshei Ostrovtzer Synagogue where Friedman-Burley's great-grandfather, Israel Nachman Weinberg, was one of the founders in 1922 and the first president, and where his grandparents, Helen and Jack Friedman, were married in 1943.

The invitation read, "Nathan's bar mitzvah renews Cecil Street as a sacred and significant space for our family."

The centre, which is now in the heart of Chinatown, was built in 1835 as a Free Baptist church. In 1906, it was sold to the Agudath Achim Society. At the time, the city's Jewish population was climbing – it rose from 3,090 in 1901 to 34,614 in 1921 – and many landsmanshaft shuls were being built by the new immigrants.

Nathan's parents, Debra Friedman, a photographer, and Robert Burley, an assistant professor at the School of Image Arts at Ryerson University, said they "wanted to have a historical and personal reference" for the bar mitzvah.

In 1922, Israel Weinberg, who was born in Krasnik, Poland, in 1896 and emigrated to Canada in 1920, and David Sussman negotiated the purchase of the building for the Ostrovtzer congregation, which became the Anshei Ostrovtzer Synagogue. It was sold to the City of Toronto in the early 1960s.

"My grandfather was largely responsible for negotiating the sale of the synagogue," said Debra Friedman. "One of the stipulations was ensuring that various elements of the Ostrovtzer Synagogue remain[ed] in place – the chandelier, the white marble Hebrew founders' date stone, the marble yahrzeit plaque and the corner stone."

Friedman and Burley said that when they began to look for a venue for Nathan's bar mitzvah, they recognized the importance of the Cecil Street location for their family.

"It turned out to be a great experience for everyone," said Friedman. "People in my parents' generation had wonderful memories. Nathan and his friends loved it as well. They learned the significance of the building and had a glimpse of Toronto's Jewish history. It was nostalgic and we made history part of our ceremony."

She said the family was "delighted that the Ostrovtzer Jewish roots are still evident in the building on Cecil Street.

"We will certainly consider the former Anshei Ostrovtzer Synagogue when we plan bar mitzvahs for the other boys."

Holocaust Centre program honours youngsters who did not survive

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Well over one million Jewish children under the age of 16 were murdered during the Holocaust. Many of them did not live long enough to enjoy a bar mitzvah.

Today, thanks to a heartwarming program created by the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto, there is a special way of remembering and honouring those youngsters who did not survive.

The Centre has established a "twinning" program through which a boy or girl who is becoming a bar/bat mitzvah "shares" this special moment with a child who perished in the Holocaust.

As part of the twinning procedure, the bar/bat mitzvah youngster conducts several educational research assignments, such as finding detailed information about the child with whom he or she is about to be twinned. Conducting the research not only teaches participants about the child who died, but about the Holocaust itself.

When 13-year-old Joshua Marcus of Thornhill was recently called to the bima at Beth David Synagogue, he was accompanied by 76-year-old Stanley (Zelic) Frydman.

"I chose to twin my bar mitzvah in honour of Volvela Frydman (1925-1943), a Jewish boy who was unable to experience his own bar mitzvah," says Joshua. "When Mr. Frydman walked with me to the bima, he stood there silently so that his late brother was, in a way, finally having his own bar mitzvah, through mine. Mr. Frydman was born in the city of Chmielnik, Poland. My great great bubby Rose and my cousin Hilda also came from Chmielnik."

In undertaking his research on Volvela Frydman, it's easy to understand why Joshua Marcus was so moved by his life story.

In 1942 the Nazis took Volvela, along with his younger brother, Stanley, and two uncles to the slave labour camp, Skarzysko-Kamienna.

On a Saturday in 1943, 10 men were awakened in the middle of the night. Volvela was one of them.

"Zelik my brother, they're going to shoot me – I'm not lucky," Volvela said. "Our father told us the war will someday be over. I hope you will be lucky. I hope you will survive. You must promise me that you will tell everyone what the murderers did to me and our family. Tell this to everyone you meet."

Volvela took off his jacket and boots. He gave them to his brother and said, "they're going to shoot me now." Volvela then walked away barefoot to the Nazi guards. Zelik never saw him again.

"Mr. Frydman wasn't really too keen to talk about the Holocaust, but his wife convinced him to do it for his brother," says Joshua. "It was such an honour for me to see a man like Mr. Frydman, a man who has endured so much in his life, open up to me, and do this for his brother, and for me. "

"This twinning program is wonderful," says Sandra Marcus, Joshua's proud mother. "We didn't want Joshua to get caught up in the bar mitzvah party mentality. We wanted his bar mitzvah to be something that would fill his soul. He worked so hard on the research involved. If parents are looking to instill our past, present and future as Jews in their children, this is a great way to do it."

Judy Feld Carr – a heroine in our midst

By WENDY LAMPERT

Many of those rescued by Judy Feld Carr named their daughters after her as a tribute. Here, Feld Carr hugs one of her namesakes, Judy Hamra, daughter of Rabbi Ibrahim Hamra, the former Chief Rabbi of Syria and Feld Carr's first contact there.

Community activism on behalf of Jews in need around the world is a defining trait of Jewish Toronto. Wendy Eisen was at the forefront of the movement to free Soviet Jewry. Julia Koschitzky and Phil Granovsky assumed international leadership positions, and Rabbi Gunther Plaut continues to advocate forcefully for understanding between Jews of diverse backgrounds and beliefs. Then there's Judy Feld Carr, the force for freedom on behalf of Syrian Jews.

It's hard to believe that this unassuming former music teacher and grandmother of 10 was responsible for the rescue of 3,228 Jews from Syria over 28 years, in a story of international intrigue that is the stuff of legends.

To the Jewish families she rescued, she is known only as "Mrs. Judy," if they know her name at all. And it was only after she secretly smuggled her last Jewish family out of Syria (they arrived in New York less than an hour before two hijacked planes flew into the World Trade Centre) that this formidable woman's story became more clear.

Born in Montreal and raised in Sudbury, Feld Carr felt the sting of anti-Semitism from a young age. "I grew up in a small town and was the only Jew in school. I was beaten up in Grade 2 for killing Christ – they knocked out my front teeth."

It was through her Sudbury neighbour and Holocaust survivor, Sophie, that Feld Carr says she learned the horrific plight of the Jewish people. Sophie, whose two children were killed in Auschwitz and who was a victim of Dr. Joseph Mengele's horrifying experiments, inspired her.

"When I was 10 years old, Sophie told me, 'you have to do something so that this never happens again to the Jewish people.' I never forgot it," said Feld Carr. "Every time I thought about quitting, which was every second day, I'd always think of Sophie, and say, okay, I'm going back. I promised her, and I did it."

'God works in strange ways...'

How did she enter the dangerous world of smuggling, bribery, escape routes and secret agents?

"God works in strange ways," says Feld Carr. "This isn't my background. I'm from Sudbury. How did I know how to do this? The whole thing is surreal."

It all began in 1972, when Feld Carr and her first husband, Dr. Ronald Feld, learned about the plight of 12 young Jewish men who died trying to escape from Syria.

They decided, with some friends, to take up the cause of Syrian Jewry. Through a single phone call, "the one and only phone call that was ever made to Syria from a Jewish community," notes Feld Carr, she managed to connect with Rabbi Ibrahim Hamra, the Chief Rabbi of Syria in Damascus, and boxes of religious books began to flow from Toronto to Syria. They communicated through code in the addresses of telegrams.

Then in 1973, her husband died. Feld Carr decided to continue her work, helped by the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Jews in Arab Lands, set up by the board of governors of Beth Tzedec Congregation. She mounted a human rights campaign to lobby politicians and the media. In 1977, she married Donald Carr, who also supported her efforts.

Over time, it became clear that there were people in Syria who could be bribed – that Jews could be "ransomed" out of the country. "So I started to buy people for a price," she said.

Feld Carr developed networks through which she funneled money to agents for ransom and to reliable smugglers. "This rescue was so successful because I told nobody how it was working," she said.

"The stress was terrible," she added. She traveled all over the world to undertake her secret negotiations, which were always conducted through intermediaries. "I had to live two lives – a life of international intrigue, and then I had to be a mother and do the normal things of life."

'Everyone can make a difference...'

The danger was immense – both for the families she was trying to rescue, who could be killed if discovered, and for Feld Carr, who received many threats. "The fact that I'm still alive is a miracle," she said.

The work itself was, at times, distasteful. "The disgusting part was buying another human being. How do you negotiate the price of human lives? I was breaking up children from their parents. It was like the 1940s – they were desperate to get their children out," Feld Carr noted.

Many of those Feld Carr smuggled out are now living in Israel, although they can be found as far away as Mexico City and Sao Paolo, Brazil. And many have named their children after her.

She has received several awards for her heroic efforts on behalf of Syrian Jewry, but the one she holds closest to her heart is the Order of Canada. "It's amazing – I got the Order of Canada for saving Jews. That had never happened in Canadian history. Now, that's something," she said. "Everybody does things according to what they are put there for. Everyone can make a difference."

B'yachad participants get emotional high from mission

By DVORA WILSHANSKY & WENDY LAMPERT

With most participants now home after a spectacular week in Israel, members of the UJA Federation B'yachad Mission are still feeling the emotional high of being in Israel with so many other Jewish North Americans.

Some Torontonians getting ready for the GA Solidarity March.

The mission, chaired by Michael Buckstein, Stephen Goldhar and Barry Zagdanski, counted more than 300 participants from Toronto. It coincided with the General Assembly (GA), the world's largest gathering of Jewish leaders. About 6,000 people participated in the GA, including a Canadian contingent of more than 600.

"I went to Israel to have a look, to see and enjoy things, expecting it to be very educational. But it was so much more. Everything was so alive; it made me feel good that I could help just by being there, that we've done our bit to help," said participant Bernie Abrams.

"I was here two years ago, and it was so deserted at the Cardo you could have shot a cannon down the street," noted B'yachad participant Tona Abrams. "This week it was packed, but I know it won't be that busy now that we've all left. We have to make sure that there is a constant flow of people to change this," she said.

B'yachad included unique experiences such as a day of volunteering with social service agencies and Canada Salutes Israel at the Palmachim Air Force Base, where more than 700 IDF soldiers joined the Canadian delegation for a celebration and a special address by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

B'yachad was JoAnn Gould's first UJA Federation mission experience, and she won't forget how it has made her feel. "At Palmachim, I felt the total effect of sending your children into the army," she said. "They were babies in uniform, and they are protecting our country. It was a spiritual evening. We were thanked all the time for coming, and then we turned around and told them, 'no, thank you for caring!" she said.

"The entire mission was marvelous," said participant Sheila Dropkin. "I've been to Israel many times, and this is one of the most outstanding experiences I've ever had. It was just wonderful."

Mission participants took part in the GA solidarity march through the flag-lined streets of Jerusalem. Bernie Fine walked with his wife, Andrea, their friends and their grandson. "The country is alive, there are people in the streets," Andrea said.

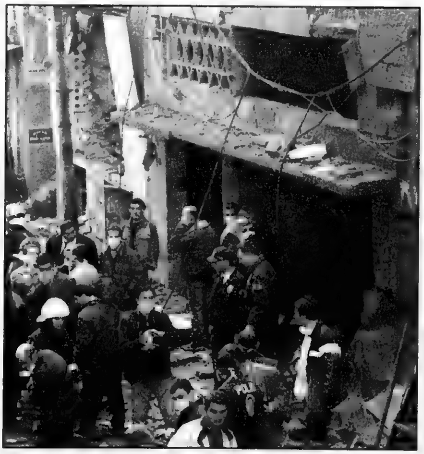
"This mission was a special one – it was hands-on," she added. "Every single person who came on this mission wanted to be there. No one was afraid. It was fabulous, and I was sorry to go home."

Toronto partner organizations come to the aid of Turkish Jewry

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) - UJA Federation's overseas partner organizations – are assisting the grieving Turkish Jewish community after the recent synagogue bombings in Istanbul.



The entrance of the N'vei Shalom Synagogue is seen after an explosion in Istanbul on November 15. Suicide car bombers attacked two synagogues in simultaneous blasts, killing 26 people and injuring over 300. The N'vei Shalom Synagogue is the city's largest. The other bomb severely damaged the Beth Israel Synagogue.

(AP Photo/Murad Sezer)

A total of 26 people were killed in the attacks and more than 300 were injured.

"These terror attacks on Jews praying in the N'vei Shalom and Beth Israel synagogues were perpetrated by Israel's enemies and haters of peace. Jewish people in the Diaspora are under fire," said JAFI Director General Giora Romm. "In recent years, Jews worldwide have become the target of those who hate Israel, who hate the U.S., and those who hate the west as a whole."

Immediately after the simultaneous attacks took place, JAFI sent an eight-member team to Turkey consisting of social workers, psychologists, and youth counselors who are experienced in dealing with victims of trauma.

The organization also quickly opened a Situation Room in Jerusalem to handle queries from relatives and olim (new immigrants) from Turkey presently living in Israel.

JAFI Chairman Sallai Meridor and JAFI Board of Governors Chair Carole Solomon, together with JAFI senior staff, participated in a telephone conference call following the bombings with leaders of Istanbul's Jewish community. The JAFI leadership was updated on the situation in Istanbul and heard about the pressing needs of the Turkish Jewish community.

Among the 26 killed in the attacks were 6 Jews: a pregnant 35-year-old; an eight-year-old girl and her 85-year-old grandmother; a synagogue security guard, and a 60-year-old woman who died of a heart attack after the explosion.

"In the case of the Istanbul community, they called us to request post-trauma assistance to children, as well as educational activities for young people," says Romm. "Every time something like this happens, the only Jewish organization that has such a global reach is the Jewish Agency."

Lina Filiba, executive vice president of the Turkish Jewish community attended a recent JAFI Board of Governors meeting in Jerusalem for one day after the bombings to thank the organization for its humanitarian gestures, particularly because the medical team in Turkey is not experienced in trauma after terror attacks.

"This was bound to happen," said Filiba. "If we didn't have security as good as it is, the tragedy could have been a lot worse. We wouldn't have been as lucky. Something here is changing. The peaceful life here is different now."

Turkey's Jewish population, with a 1,000-year history, numbers about 27,000, of whom 24,500 live in Istanbul.

In response to the twin bombings, JDC has opened a Turkey Relief Fund to assist victims. To make a donation, please call Shimmy Wenner at UJA Federation, 416-631-5699.

Assisting victims of terror and combating worldwide anti-Semitism are two key components of UJA Federation Campaign 2004 - For Israel and the Jewish World.

Intelligent Gospel will not encourage anti-Semitism

By MICHAEL COREN

Guest Voice

My kids have a habit of telling me about movies by giving me the numbers of stars the films receive in the newspapers.

"Two stars, Dad, no good."

Problem is, the givers of the stars see the world, and the movies, through the prism and sometimes the prison of their own values. The beauty-is-in-the-eye-of-the-beholder cliché holds true.

That's interesting when it comes to the new Matrix film, but it's profound and often painful when it comes to movies that focus on religion. I sat through Garth Drabinsky's The Gospel of John and was moved to tears by its sensitivity, faithfulness and sheer beauty. I can't say that my Jewish friends have reacted in the same way, but many have appreciated it.

Then there are the others, including Paul Shaviv, the author of a Nov. 6 review in this newspaper, who think the film is horrible. Some have even compared a number of scenes in the movie to Nazi propaganda. As someone who generally won't shut up, I'm speechless.

I should provide some background. I'm a Christian, and therefore have biases. I also had three Jewish grandparents, and on my television and radio show and in my Toronto Sun column, I am an outspoken supporter of Israel and the Jewish people. Which is why I receive an average of 20 anti-Semitic letters a week promising to kill my entire family.

So I've paid my dues. I also speak in churches every week, and in my years of doing so, have found only a love for the Jews, one based not on some twisted idea of biblical prophecy, but on a genuine commitment to Israel, to the people chosen by God.

I haven't the heart to tell them that terribly clever liberal Jewish writers mock evangelical Christians, question their integrity and show crass ingratitude for their love. Not that they would mind. They would just be surprised. We marginalize the best and sometimes the only friends we have.

Which leads me to John. He was a Jew, and the people he wrote about were, with a few Latin exceptions, Jews as well. The movie goes out of its way to acknowledge this from the start, explaining that this was, so to speak, an in-house debate between Jews.

Some of the Pharisees are shown as kind and gentle, others as harsh and unbending. But even the latter seem curious and confused rather than malicious. This may seem redundant, but this is a movie about Jesus, not a public relations film about the Pharisees.

It's also important to know that Jewish people were involved in every stage of the film's production.

It's clearly impossible to make a central plank of the New Testament completely amenable to Jews. That would be an insult to Christianity as well as to Judaism. There are differences, and only a sloppy and silly ecumenism could obscure them. But if anyone thinks that this jubilantly intelligent movie would encourage anti-Semitism, they are seeing the world through their own fears rather than through the goodness of the mainly Christian audiences who will go to see it.

Compromise works both ways. Jews rightly demand empathy from non-Jews. Christians would also like a little understanding from those they regard as their spiritual siblings.

Broadcaster and columnist Michael Coren is the host of Michael Coren Live on CTS and of CFRB radio's Michael Coren Show. He also writes a syndicated weekly column for the Toronto Sun.

Olmert slams concessions made by former PM

Olmert would also not speculate on where a new border should be drawn.

"It's too early to suggest any specific line, but it won't be the June 4, 1967 line," he said, adding that the border should include "a united Jerusalem under the full sovereignty of Israel."

Olmert, who served as mayor of Jerusalem from 1993 until last winter before resigning to seek a seat in the Knesset, lashed out at concessions reportedly made by former prime minister Ehud Barak at the 2000 Camp David summit.

"[Barak] breached the confidence of Israel's voters," Olmert said. "He promised not to divide Jerusalem. And then he offered almost every precious part of Jerusalem. History will never forgive him for that."

Asked whether Israel should relinquish communities in the West Bank and Gaza as part of an agreement with the Palestinians, Olmert replied, "Under no circumstances will Israel ever pull out from all the settlements. No [Israeli] government would survive that."

When pressed about whether Israel will have to relinquish isolated settlements, he said, "It won't be smart to discuss this issue outside a comprehensive agreement [with the Palestinians]."

But in the next breath, he said, "We'll reach the inevitable conclusion that a comprehensive settlement is not within reach."

Olmert suggested that the internationally sponsored road map peace plan will remain frozen until the Palestinians fulfill their obligations to crack down on terrorism.

He expressed hope that the new Palestinian government, led by Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia, will deal with terrorism.

"We're ready to give the PA a chance," Olmert said.

But, he noted, the PA's security organizations are still under Arafat's "complete control," and he said Arafat's probable domination of the new Palestinian cabinet will make it impossible for the PA to wage war against terror.

"Chances are the PA will not fight terror. That may kill the road map for good."

Asked whether he is still committed to the option of killing Arafat, Olmert said, "What I meant to say is that if he is individually responsible for terror, as he is, why should he enjoy any immunity?"

During his visit, Olmert spoke at a Canadian Society for Yad Vashem dinner, met with local investors and had meetings with Foreign Minister Bill Graham and Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty.

cost dental clinics and centres for disabled children.Lupolianski, who has 12 children and 12 grandchildren, founded Yad Sarah in 1976 when he was a teacher in a school in Jerusalem.

The organization, which is open to Jews and Arabs, has received many awards, including the Israel Prize and the Knesset Speaker's Award. It has 96 branches and some 6,000 volunteers,

Yad Sarah took shape after a crisis in Lupolianski's own family. When Lupolianski had to borrow a vaporizer from a neighbour for a sick child, he discovered that such devices were hard to find in mid-1970s Israel.

He bought a few, then lent them to others, and soon neighbours started dropping off vaporizers and other equipment – crutches, walkers and wheelchairs – they no longer needed.

Realizing there was a great need for an organization to help the sick and needy, Lupoliansky established Yad Sarah in 1976 as a non-profit organization.

Before long, thousands of Israelis all over the country were being assisted by Yad Sarah.

Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada, was to hold a reception in his honour in Toronto. "There is a great interest here in learning from his experiences," Divon said.

Lupoliansky was also slated to meet with the mayor of Toronto.

Before coming to Toronto, Lupolianski was to visit New York City and and Baltimore.

Police called in for defacements of election posters

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto Police Service's hate crimes unit has been contacted over attempts to undermine the election campaign of York University student Paul Cooper, who is running for president of the York Federation of Students (YFS).

Cooper, who is majoring in political science, is president of the Young Zionist Partnership, a right-wing activist group he co-founded in 2002. His 31-member slate is the first that Hillel has ever endorsed. (See "York Hillel endorses student govt. slate," CJN, Nov. 20) The elections were scheduled to be held from Nov. 20 to Nov. 26.

Talia Klein, director of Hillel at York, called the university's security services and the Toronto Police Service after she discovered an election poster with a "Hitler moustache" drawn on Cooper's face on Nov. 14, along with other defaced signs.

"It upset me that anyone was going to suggest that a Jewish student is akin to Hitler, especially a week after Holocaust Education Week. It's hateful," said Klein.

Cooper agreed that the timing made the poster defacement "pretty insensitive and very hurtful."

Even before this incident, he told The CJN there was "a concerted effort to demonize him" as a Jewish student. In an e-mail sent on the Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights list serve, for example, a supporter of Cooper's opponent Abdul Salick denounced Cooper's "York-Kahanist partnership" and its "slate of Islamophobic racists who want to shut down all political discourse on campus."

But Cooper, like Salick, says he is focusing on general – not political – student concerns.

Among the eleven Cooper posters presented to the police, the other 10 bore the words "racist hack," "hack" or "racist."

Det. James Hogan of the hate crimes unit said he "could not say with any confidence that there is hate involved," in part because other candidates' posters were also vandalized and also because of the limited nature of the incident.

In a separate incident, a candidate for faculty of education councillor, Nariman Abu-Abed, was disqualified from running as part of Salick's slate on the basis of slander against Cooper and his list of candidates. Her comments were made publicly at a Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights event, said YFS returning officer Ryan Jarvis.

Experiencing Israel in a whole new way

By CARLY KIRSHEN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

I hear a siren outside of my apartment window and my mind immediately flashes to Israel. The team and I pull up to a head-on collision and everyone knows what they have to do. I grab one stretcher and bandages and run to help the injured.

This summer I volunteered for Magen David Adom (MDA), the Israeli equivalent of the Red Cross. In collaboration with the Jewish Agency, MDA trains international volunteers to be a part of Israel's emergency response teams.

I worked 40 hours a week on the ambulances in Bat Yam. The program is designed for youth to experience life in Israel and to gain insight into the country's spirit.

Like many '20-somethings, I have travelled to Israel. I have done the family trips, not to mention the Birthright tour. This summer, however, I was able to experience Israel in a whole new way that only an extended, rooted stay could provide. It was as if I became a temporary citizen. I experienced the daily joys and traumas that accompanied my special window into my homeland.

One Shabbat, near the end of my trip, I was invited to a medic's home. I was instantly treated like part of the family as I blessed, ate, drank and sang. Just as we were about to start dessert, we were interrupted by the news on the television. There had been a bomb, and I could hear everyone's heart hit the floor. While I scrambled to the sofa, I was shaken to see some of the MDA workers and volunteers that I personally knew appear on the screen. The tragedy took on a whole new meaning.

Countless people in Israel have very little in terms of material possessions and sometimes tend to live beyond their means. Still, many Israeli citizens give unselfishly of their time to volunteer whenever they can. In fact, 90 per cent of those working for MDA are volunteers

In this case, time is more valuable than money. MDA cannot exist without donations from Jews in the Diaspora, but they also rely heavily on physical effort. Israelis are proud of their country and want to contribute to make it prosper. Volunteers give up hours of work, home life and sleep in order to be on duty.

Eight straight hours could be used for daily life activities, but this large time commitment is never a problem. Even during the endless 11 p.m.-7 a.m. shifts, I was inspired by the volunteers who had been at work during the day and still stayed alert all night to help those in need.

In spite of everything, there remained a pane of glass in my window separating me from my homeland. I knew that at the end of August I would board the El Al airplane and return to my university life in London, Ont. I knew that when an emergency call came to the station, a stranger was in danger. I knew that a suicide bomber did not claim the life of a family member.

I am thankful that I had the opportunity to go to Israel, and I hope that soon I will be able to return. The trip awakened a heightened sense of awareness of the dangers that Israeli citizens face everyday and encouraged a new amazing sense of pride in my Jewish identity. As the airplane touched down at Pearson International, I couldn't help but think that even though I physically left Israel, my heart remained behind.

Concert held in memory of TV stars

By DANY HOROVITZ
Special to The CJN

Hillel Montreal organized Music in Memory, a concert at Club Soda Nov. 16, to raise funds in memory of Jaclyn Linetsky and Vadim Schneider, who both died in a car accident Sept. 8.

Proceeds went to the Jaclyn Linetsky Memorial Fund.

"After Jaclyn passed away, her parents started this foundation. It's a sub-division of the Montreal Just for Kids Foundation, which buys medical equipment for the Montreal Children's Hospital," said Josh Elberg, chair of Music in Memory.

Linetsky and Schneider were co-stars of the YTV program 15/Love, and Linetsky was also the English voice of the popular children's cartoon Caillou.

"I don't think there are many kids in North America who don't know who Caillou is," Elberg said. "She had such a profound impact on their lives, and now she is continuing to do so because we are having a charity that's in her name and helping children who are sick."

Hundreds of people came out to support the cause. The concert, which took more than a month to organize, featured all kinds of music, including punk, rock and R&B. Headlining the show were Chris Brown and Kate Fenner, folk performers and former members of the Bourbon Tabernacle Choir.

Coyne said live music is a great way to raise money because "if you're trying to relay a message to somebody, then they can see it in your face. Contact is the most important thing."

Towards the end of the evening, a video tribute in memory of the lives of Linetsky and Schneider was shown. It was made by the producers of 15/Love and featured the pair in their roles. Afterwards, Hillel presented the Jaclyn Linetsky Memorial Fund with a cheque for $5,000, raised through ticket sales.

Saving money on campus

By LEORA BERESKIN

University can be a pretty scary place. It's not easy to move away from the comforts of home to live with a bunch of strangers. It's even harder to go from being your teachers' favourite student to just one of 500 new faces to your professors. And I'm not even going to mention how frightening it is to watch your grades decrease in direct proportion to the increase in your weight.

But all that is kid stuff compared to the real fright of university: the fact those aforementioned things are costing you thousands of dollars a year.

University undergraduate tuition can range from $3,000 to $8,000 a year, and that doesn't include living costs, books, supplies or the single most important expense of college life – beer! It's not hard to see why students are graduating thousands of dollars in debt, but it doesn't have to be so bad. There are a number of quick and easy ways to save money.

Tuition and incidental fees:

When you get your fee statement in the mail, don't pass out. Yes, it is an exorbitant amount of money, and yes, you do have to pay most of it. But luckily, many incidental fees are optional, and you can get a refund for them. Generally, things such levies for the student newspaper and radio station, as well as supplementary health insurance, are not mandatory, and getting your money back for them is a nice treat.

Books:

Books are incredibly expensive. They can easily cost more than $600 for a semester, if purchased new. Fortunately, most universities have used bookstores, either on campus or nearby, so you can buy previously owned books at a discount price.

Some students decide to save money by photocopying entire textbooks. That's not the best idea, because it's both illegal and – perhaps more importantly – incredibly time consuming. A better option is to get a previous edition from the school library. Old editions are a great resource for courses that don't change much over time, so use them for history, not computer science.

In fact, in my first year, I used a plant biology text that was published two years before I was even born. But hey, it was free.

Going Out and Having Fun:

Although it's good to watch your money, it's also important to go out and enjoy yourself. Your years at university are supposed to be spent having fun – late nights at the bars, dancing up a storm, going out for nice dinners. And if you can fit a bit of studying into that hectic schedule, that's great too. But it's important to distinguish the good ways of saving money from the bad ways. For instance, don't try to save by not doing your laundry. And as appealing as it might be to live off super cheap macaroni and cheese, you need more variety to achieve a balanced diet – and ward off scurvy.

There are many ways to cut back and save while at university. Just remember to opt for a good long distance phone plan, so you can call your parents to ask for more cash when you inevitably run out.

Leora Bereskin is a biology major at the University of Waterloo.

Quebec firm invests $2 million US in Israeli biotechnology

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – A Montreal-based venture capital fund is so confident in Israel's biotechnology sector that it is investing $2 million (US) in a start-up company that has developed a novel means of administering drugs through a skin patch.

Bernard Coupal, president and chief executive officer of T^2C^2/Bio, said at a press conference held jointly with Israel's industry and trade minister, Ehud Olmert, that his company is joining in an $8.9-million (US) financing of Israel's TransPharma Medical Ltd.

The Israeli company, established in 2000 and now with 25 employees, has patented a drug delivery system that is unique in allowing medication to pass through the skin no matter what the size or type of the drug molecule. It can be used where taking the drug orally is unsuitable.

Coupal, who holds a PhD in chemical engineering, said he was impressed by Israel's achievement in the life sciences and high technology fields during three visits to the country in recent years, as well as by its "entrepreneurial culture." He finds the "incubator" system, a collaboration between the government, academia and business, an especially effective means of encouraging innovation and bringing scientific discoveries to market.

"We have been watching closely Israel's technology and life sciences sector for more than five years now. Based on our experience and knowledge, there is exciting potential for investment in select sectors where Israeli companies have a relative technological advantage, providing we can help them develop additional capabilities to become global market leaders."

He specifically cited medical devices as an area in which Israelis excel.

"Israel is emerging as a promising technology hot-bed for investment as Canadian venture funds scan the world to find future global leaders in high-tech and life sciences fields. We at T^2C^2/Bio are proud to be the very first Canadian venture capital firm to invest in a private life sciences company in Israel," he said.

T^2C^2 associate Philippe Coriat has been named to TransPharma's board of directors. Prior to joining T^2B^2 in 1998, Coriat found Biocorp International, an Israeli technological transfer consulting firm for the life sciences industry.

In a statement, TransPharma CEO Daphna Heffetz, who holds a doctorate in biochemistry from the Weizmann Institute of Science, said the investment "will move us closer to getting our first drug product onto the market."

The $8.9-million financing was led by Evergreen Partners, an American company that has a successful 15-year track record of venture capital investment in Israel. In addition to T^2C^2/Bio, investors are Pitango Venture Capital, one of Israel's leading venture capital firms and TransPharma's parent company, VitaLife and Biomedical Investments.

Coupal has no illusions he will get rich quickly from this investment. "It usually takes 12 to 15 years to recoup an investment [in a start-up biotechnology firm]. However, TransPharma is in Phase I clinical testing, so we expect to wait four to five years."

Seen at a joint news conference are, from left, Bernard Coupal, Ehud Olmert and Thomas Hecht. [Mickey Gutstein photo]

Following the press conference, Coupal was the guest speaker on investment opportunities in Israel at a luncheon at the Mount Royal Club, which his company co-hosted with the Israel Economic Mission to Canada, the Consulate General of Israel in Montreal and Thomas Hecht, chair emeritus of IBEX Technologies Inc. Olmert, who is also vice-premier of Israel, was the guest of honour.

Coupal said Israel represents an "interesting potential" for joint ventures or other forms of collaboration with Canada's world-renowned life sciences sector, for the development of new therapies, particularly at the clinical stage.

T^2C^2/Bio is one of three funds of T^2C^2 (Transfer, Technologies, Commercialization, Capital), which was founded in 1997 and headed by Coupal from the beginning. The company provides seed money to promising projects developed at universities, at research centres and in industry in both biotechnology and information technology.

The company has total assets of $59.5 million, $23 million of which is under the T^2C^2/Bio. It has founded and invested in more than 30 companies.

A former academic, Coupal was director-general of the Biotechnology Research Institute of the National Research Council of Canada and founding president of and CEO of Société Innovatech du Grand Montréal, a provincial government agency investing in high-tech, before founding T^2C^2.

Olmert said T^2C^2 is following in the footsteps of some of the leading high-tech companies in the world in investing in Israel. He noted that Intel Corp. recently put another $600 million (US) into its plant at Kiryat Gat, which was a $2-billion investment. "It's the largest R and D centre in the world outside the United States, with 2,000 workers."

IBM, Microsoft and Hewlett-Packard have also made major investments lately.

There is renewed interest in Israel in the investment community generally, he noted. The New York state pension fund manager, for example, recently made a $200-million investment in a new Israeli fund, he said.

"Israel has proven beyond dispute that the quality of its technological innovation places it among the highest in the world, almost equal to the U.S."

Olmert said the Israeli government is sweetening incentives for foreign investors. First among these is an amendment to the law which now forbids the export of intellectual property. "We have decided to allow the export of intellectual property, but, of course, there will be a price tag, a certain premium to be paid."

The government is also considering "dramatically" improved tax benefits for companies eligible for government assistance in area defined by Israel as "national priorities." These will mostly be companies engaged in export. Today, the maximum withholding tax is 25 per cent. That may be reduced to 10 per cent or less, Olmert said.

Meanwhile, the Israeli government continues to invest 4.2 per cent of the country's gross domestic product in R and D and the number of high-tech graduates over the past decade has doubled to 8,000 a year.

Heschel urges more funding for Jewish women's studies

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Leading Jewish feminist Susannah Heschel brought her thoughts on Jewish feminism to Winnipeg earlier this month and called for increased funding for Jewish women's studies.

Heschel, the daughter of Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, one of the most important Jewish thinkers of the 20th century, noted that women play a very important role in transmitting Judaism to the next generation through their practices in the home, and she said Jewish institutions need to change their attitudes toward women.

"There is still condescension toward women," she said. "It is important to highlight patronizing attitudes and try to change them."

> 'Important to highlight patronizing attitudes and try to change them'

Heschel, an associate professor and chair of the Jewish studies program at Dartmouth College in New Hampshire, edited a prominent 1983 collection of essays titled On Being a Jewish Feminist and is currently preparing another anthology on feminist readings of classical Jewish texts.

She spoke as part of the Rabbi Rappaport Education and Lecture Series, under the aegis of the Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre and Congregation Etz Chayim.

Heschel's topic, "An Orange on a Seder Plate: Jewish Feminism in the New Century" derived, she explained to an audience of about 150, from a feminist Haggadah written by students at Oberlin College in Ohio.

The story goes, she said, that a woman once approached a rabbi on erev Pesach and asked where lesbians fit in Judaism. The rabbi's disdainful reply was that a lesbian in Judaism is like a crust of bread on a seder plate. In response, the Oberlin authors included a crust of bread on their seder plate as a symbol of solidarity with people who are marginalized.

Heschel said she felt that because a crust of bread violates the rules of pesach, an orange would be a more appropriate symbol (because, she has explained, you can spit out the seeds as if you're spitting out bigotry and homophobia), so she helped start a different tradition among Jewish feminists.

The initial goals of Jewish feminists in the 1970s and 1980s, she said, were inclusion and equality in the synagogue.

"The next stage was the recovery of our history and traditions – such as Rosh Chodesh celebrations, reclamation of the mikvah and women's interpretations of Pesach," she said.

"Not much had been written by Jewish women. We needed new commentaries to address the low self-esteem many women feel."

Heschel also called for more inclusive language in the liturgy and gender-neutral references to God.

"We haven't figured out how to make those changes yet. That will have to be resolved by future generations," she said.

"Prayer is both from the community's and the individual's heart. God's otherness is not necessarily oppressive. On the other hand, that personal relationship with God is important, and if we eliminate all of God's personal attributes, we would eliminate that relationship."

Canada, Israel sign agricultural agreement

OTTAWA — Israel's Agriculture Research Organization (ARO) last week signed a letter of intent on agricultural research and development with Agriculture and Agri-food Canada.

The agreement was signed following a three-day Canada-Israel agricultural research seminar hosted by Agriculture and Agri-Food Canada – the first in its kind between the two countries.

The seminar covered four main areas that are at the forefront of agricultural research in the world today: functional genomics, food safety and quality, insect resistance and precision agriculture.

Scientists from Israel and Canada have identified specific projects in which complementary work could benefit both countries. They include solutions for better and safer agricultural products and farming practices as well as the utilization of agricultural research for medical applications.

Co-operation between the scientists will start immediately and will include bilateral visits and exchanges of scientists between the two research organizations.

Israel and Canada have also agreed to sign a memorandum of understanding on agricultural research and development in the coming months.

אני בטוח שכיום שמונה מתוך עשרה ישראלים או יהודים בעולם אומרים: אין עם מי לדבר שָם. אז הִנֵה באים ארבעה האנשים שיודעים יותר מכל אדם אחר בעולם את מה שיש "שָם" ומצהירים שזה בּוֹבָע מְעֻיָסס. קשה להניח שדברים אלה יביאו לשנוי ביום אחד. יושבת היום ממשלה שנבחרה על ידי מתנחלים, ואחד מהעקרונות המרכזיים של ראשי השב"ך לשעבר הוא שישראל חייבת לפנות את הגדה בדיוק כמו שכירורג כורת אבר שיש בו סרטן. אבל רב שיח מסוג זה עוזר להביא לפני השטח את עוּבְדַת העוּבדות- המשך הטרור מביא למחיקת ההישגים הכלכליים והאנושיים של ישראל ומסיג אותה עשרות שנים אחורה.

הִנֵה כמה ציטוטים:

" אם אי פעם יהיה שלום עם הפלשתינים אני לא רואה איך מדינת ישראל יכולה להיות אחראית לשלום אזרחיה הגרים בחברון. אני לא יודע איך לעשות את זה, ואני לא חושב שמישהו יודע" (יעקוב פרי).

"סיכול טרור לא עושים עם פצצות ולא עם חליקופטרים אלא בשקט. למה זה מגביר את הטרור? כי זה גלוי, כי יש בזה אלמנט של נקמנות" (אברהם שלום).

Israel's treatment of press unique among wartime democracies

According to Reports

By

PAUL MICHAELS

How does a democracy deal with the media during wartime?

In the 1991 Gulf War, the United States largely restricted media access to the battlefield. Britain did the same during the Falklands War in 1982. In the war in Iraq last spring, the Americans decided to court the media, but they still attempted to control coverage by "embedding" reporters within army units.

Russia, a quasi-democracy, greatly restricts journalists' access to Chechnya, so much so that most people in the West are oblivious to the fact that in the past decade, more than 100,000 Chechens have been killed in combat. Many other conflicts fall into the same category. In Colombia, Kashmir, Congo, Sudan and Algeria, terrible carnage is occurring, but the coverage is either too restricted or simply too dangerous for all but the most intrepid to report on.

Israel, as always, is unique. For decades, journalists have had virtually unrestricted access to a hot story, covering the conflict with the Palestinians in relative safety and in a place where freedom of expression is generally respected.

In the spring of 2002, following a horrific spate of terrorist attacks, the Israel Defence Forces mounted an operation in the West Bank, which it temporarily closed off to foreign correspondents. This decision, some analysts argue, badly harmed Israel when many in the international media reported outrageous claims of a "massacre" of hundreds of Palestinians in the Jenin refugee camp.

Once the media restrictions were lifted, the truth came out. There was no massacre, and in fact 23 Israeli soldiers died in house-to-house combat trying to avoid endangering Palestinian civilians. But night after night, most television news reports showed Israeli tanks amid the rubble of Palestinian cities and towns, leading viewers to identify only with the Palestinians, who were portrayed as being under a merciless attack. All context was lost, particularly Israel's desperate efforts to thwart Palestinian terrorists from blowing up men, women and children on buses and in cafés.

Determined to stem this tide of negative coverage of Israel, which has helped spur the growth of anti-Semitism especially in Europe, the Israeli Government Press Office recently tried to "control the message" by making all correspondents who apply for a press card submit to a review by the Shin Bet internal security service. Protests from a number of organizations, including the Foreign Press Association (whose members include a majority of Israeli journalists working for foreign media), led to a governmental review. The plan was scrapped.

Israel's acceptance of negative media coverage is all the more pronounced when compared with the Palestinian Authority. The PA can, and does, intimidate journalists who file negative reports. But such is the price Israel must pay, even during a prolonged conflict, precisely because it is a free and democratic country. Dictatorships have it easier. Expectations by the foreign media are far lower, and the message can readily be restricted and manipulated.

However, it is much better to work with reporters than to treat them as enemies, which only results in greater resentment. When Israel learned earlier this month that the British Broadcasting Corporation was to undertake a serious review of its Mideast coverage, the government press office lifted its boycott of the corporation. BBC reporters will now once again have access to official briefings and interviews with Israeli officials. The move is a testament to Israel's ultimate respect for freedom of the press – even in a time of war.

Canadian film won't be in Canadian theatres

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Prisoner of Paradise, a Holocaust documentary that was nominated for an Academy Award this year, will be shown theatrically in the United States starting on Dec. 5, but the Canada-U.K. co-production will not be returning to Canadian theatres.

The film's co-director, producer and writer, Montrealer Malcolm Clarke, is incensed and charges that Alliance Atlantis, the Canadian distributor and a co-producer of the largely Canadian-financed film, is shelving it because it won't make money.

"Nobody in Canada is going to see this film," Clarke said.

Prisoner of Paradise is opening on Dec. 5 in New York at the Quad Cinema, a Greenwich Village house specializing in foreign and independent films, and then in Los Angeles on Dec. 12. Other U.S. cities may follow.

To qualify for the Oscars, the film had a brief run last fall at the Empress Walk Theatre in Toronto. Its official world premiere was at the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles in December 2002.

Clarke said Toronto-based Alliance Atlantis put its focus on Michael Moore's Bowling for Columbine, the much more popular film that beat Prisoner of Paradise for the Oscar. Alliance Atlantis is the Canadian distributor and a co-producer of Bowling for Columbine.

Clark charged that while Alliance Atlantis "dined out" on the prestige of having two Oscar contenders in one year, placing full-page newspaper ads to publicize the fact, it is now forsaking one of those films. He said that may be because films about the Holocaust don't sell any more.

Prisoner of Paradise, which was shortlisted for best documentary feature, tells the little-known story of Kurt Gerron, a German Jew who was a leading actor, director and cabaret performer in prewar Berlin. (He co-starred with Marlene Dietrich in the classic The Blue Angel and sang "Mack the Knife" in the original production of the Threepenny Opera.)

While an inmate at Theresienstadt during the war, Gerron was forced by the commandant to make a Nazi propaganda film whitewashing the concentration camp as a utopian haven for Jews. He was deported to Auschwitz in 1944, where he died shortly thereafter in a gas chamber.

The 90-minute film asks whether Gerron was a traitor, concerned only with saving his own life, or is beyond judgment for his actions because the circumstances were so horrific.

The movie contains never-before-seen archival footage, including scenes from Gerron's film, The Fuhrer Gives a City to the Jews, as well as interviews with Theresienstadt survivors.

Mark Slone, vice-president of marketing and publicity for Odeon Films, a division of Atlantis Alliance, told The CJN the film was intended for television, not theatre, and was, in fact, made on video. It was only when the company realized it had Oscar potential that the film was reformatted at considerable cost for the Empress Walk screenings. It was this single copy that was shown at a number of film festivals in Canada this past year.

Slone said it will not be shown again in theatres because it was sold to the History Channel and more recently to the American PBS channel.

"Once it has been sold to TV, it cannot be re-released theatrically. That would infringe on the rights of the TV purchaser."

PBS spokesperson Cara White said Prisoner of Paradise was originally scheduled to be broadcast last April, but after it got the Oscar nod, the network acceded to a request made by the film's other co-director/producer, Emmy Award-winning television producer Stuart Sender, to schedule its TV premiere after a theatrical run. The film will be broadcast sometime next year, she said.

"The point here is that, instead of a few hundred people seeing this film in a theatre, it is going to be seen by millions on TV, coast-to-coast in North America. That's a pretty sweet thing," Slone said.

While he agreed Prisoner of Paradise is not "a big money-maker" and was never meant for mainstream distribution, he rejected Clarke's assertion that Holocaust films are too numerous. He said he and many of the principals of Atlantis Alliance are Jewish, and that the company has been involved in many films on Jewish subjects.

Officially, Prisoner of Paradise is a Canada-U.K. co-production, but it was made mostly in Canada following shooting in Europe and received between $70,000 and $80,000 in Canadian public funding, Clarke said.

Steven Spielberg, the founder of the Shoah Foundation, contributed the first $100,000 (US) and lent his name to the project, which helped immeasurably in raising the remaining $1.6 million (US) necessary to make the film, Clarke said.

Clarke, who is not Jewish, believes the film can educate the public about the Holocaust because it takes a very different angle. Making the film deepened his own understanding of the atrocity, he said.

"From an intellectual perspective, I knew a huge amount about the Holocaust, but it was academic… It was not until I sat opposite someone talking matter-of-factly about the most mind-numbingly horrendous stuff that it upset me emotionally."

Popular Montreal show Chai Montreal axed

MONTREAL – Chai Montreal, the Jewish community television show that has been on the air for over 30 years, is being dropped by CH Montreal, the ethnic station owned by CanWest Global, to make way for a new show that it hopes will appeal to a younger – and larger – audience.

The half-hour show InMontreal will debut Dec. 7 at 8 p.m., the same time slot that Chai Montreal occupied.

InMontreal is the trademarked name of the magazine for young Jewish adults published by ProMontreal of FEDERATION CJA, with which CH is producing this show.

ProMontreal runs programs aimed at encouraging young Jews to stay in Quebec, and has focused over its 10-year history on helping them establish careers here.

The show's co-hosts are Mark Bergman, an announcer at radio station Mix 96, and Lisa Rubin, a singer with experience in TV research.

CH station manager Linda Fraraccio said the federation is not sponsoring the show, nor is it committed to purchasing any of the six minutes available for commercials during its slot. Her vision of InMontreal is one that reflects the community and is not limited to federation-related content.

The relationship, however, is close. The federation's publicist and writer Tara Glazer is the show's researcher and will co-ordinate its content.

Fraraccio said CH does not conduct ratings of its ethnic programming, but the sense is that Chai Montreal, which is hosted by Lisa Winston, was not being watched by enough people because of the lack of "feedback" and little advertising revenue. CH also has an advisory board with representatives drawn from different communities that offers its opinion, she said. Jonathan Goldbloom is one of its members.

The last Chai Montreal is Nov. 30, with repeats through that week. In keeping with CH's policy, InMontreal will be about Jewish life from a cultural and communal perspective, and will avoid politics or hard news.

David Suzuki warns about dangers of biotechnology

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Environmentalist and broadcaster David Suzuki warns that the long-term repercussions of biotechnology are unknown.

"Mark my words, genetically modified organisms are going to have totally unexpected effects," Suzuki said during a speech at a recent Canadian Technion Society fundraising event.

He compared the situation to the experience with the pesticide DDT and CFCs, chemicals commonly found in aerosols, which were used widely before their negative effects became known. DDT has been found to accumulate in human tissue and CFCs are known to cause depletion of the ozone layer.

Suzuki said it is "far too early" to be consuming genetically modified food, even though certain products have been permitted in Canada for the past five years.

Suzuki, a geneticist by training best known for his long-running CBC science television show The Nature of Things, said human beings are animals inextricably tied to nature.

"There is no environment out there. We are the environment. There is no separation," he told an audience of 230 at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

"We no longer feel part of the natural world. We see it as a resource for us to use. We have to rediscover we are dependent on nature, and not just see it as an opportunity."

In an illustration of just how fragile the environment is, Suzuki said if Earth was the size of a basketball, the biosphere would be as thin as Saran wrap.

"We are pumping all of our effluvium into that," he said. "We use [the environment] as a toxic dump and think it does not affect us. We are living in a shuttered world and don't see the consequences of what we do."

He attributed the dramatic rise in the incidence of asthma in children to pollution.

"Our own kids are the canaries in the mine. One out of five has asthma. It's an epidemic in the grade schools. When I was a boy, we never heard of asthma," said Suzuki, who is 67.

He said we can learn from indigenous peoples who believe that they are literally composed of the essential elements earth, water, air and fire (sunlight).

Without these, human life would be insupportable, he argued.

"Science confirms this ancient knowledge."

If we see nature as sacred, we will treat it differently, he said.

Suzuki criticized the belief that "the economy is the bottom line" and protection of the environment is secondary.

"As a biologist, this never made sense to me… It is the biosphere that makes economies possible.

"We ignore the environment at our peril. We are animals; we have needs. If they are not met, we sicken and die."

The disappearance of thousands of plant and animal species is a direct result of damage to the environment, he said.

After 40 years of activism, Suzuki has not lost his zeal.

"You may win a battle, but it is a war that must be fought over and over again."

Nor has he lost his sense of humour.

"I know a lot of people say, 'Oh God, here he comes again, Chicken Little.'"

Suzuki has launched a nature challenge to Canadians through the David Suzuki Foundation, an environmental organization he founded in 1990. It suggests 10 ways people can protect the environment in their everyday lives. Just doing three out of 10 over the course a year qualifies for the challenge.

"It's for people who know in their gut something is wrong, but don't know what to do about it," Suzuki said.

That's "good news for a change."

You can register for the challenge through the foundation's Web site at www.davidsuzuki.org.

"If we get one million people, even Ralph Klein will sign on. This is all about political change."

The evening raised more than $150,000 for the construction of Canada student residences at Technion, Israel's Institute of Technology in Haifa. The $20-million project will house more than 300 students.

Arab Israeli speaks out to defend Bedouin

By DANY HOROVITZ
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL – Israeli Bedouin Ishmael Khaldi says he's proud to be Israeli. Khaldi was speaking at Concordia University Nov. 11 as part of a Canadian tour on Israeli democracy and multiculturalism sponsored by Hasbara Fellowships and UIA Federations Canada.

"Twenty per cent of Israel's population is not Jewish, including the Bedouin, who are the smallest minority," Khaldi said in a talk that went without incident. Earlier this month he spoke at Langara College in British Columbia, where the student union made an unsuccessful attempt to ban his talk.

"Israel has many problems dealing with their minorities, but we enjoy the benefits of democracy as a modern country.

"There is no doubt" Bedouins are underrepresented in Israel's government, he said.

"[N]ot many Bedouins are educated like me. But of course, we are fully respected and have our rights as a small minority within the democratic law of Israel."

Part of the reason for this lack of education, said Khaldi, is that "Bedouins are nomads. It is part of our tradition. We used to move from place to place. [Formal] education was never a part of our tradition."

Khaldi, who has a master's degree in political science from Tel Aviv University, has served with the Israeli police and Israel's Defence Ministry. He will soon begin working for the Foreign Ministry as Israel's first Bedouin diplomat.

"Israel has been struggling since 1948 for its existence. The story of the Bedouins is an integral part of Israeli society, and today, after so many years, Israel is still struggling to live in peace and security against people who want to eliminate them. Everybody wants peace, but I think that [war] is unfortunately a needed thing."

Khaldi says the Bedouins can be used as mediators in the conflict between the Israelis and Palestinians.

"We are part of the Arab and Muslim world, but we are proud to be a part of Israel, too. We try to be, given our background, an example for other ethnic groups to be a bridge of understanding between Israel as a Jewish state – which we are a part of – and the Arab world."

Khaldi said he was once asked after a lecture he gave at the University of Illinois if he had the right to vote in Israel.

"[The questioner] said, 'I heard if you aren't Jewish in Israel, you don't have the right to vote.' I was surprised. For me, it portrayed how deep the lack of background information people here have is.

"Israel is not a perfect state," he said, but added that countries like Canada and the United States "have problems too… I'm very proud to be Israeli."

Khaldi, who spoke at McGill University the same day, also made tour stops at York University in Toronto, Carleton University in Ottawa and at the University of British Columbia, where his talks also went without incident.

Sharon met secretly with U.S. emissary

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon met secretly last week in Rome with Eliot Abrams, a member of the U.S. National Security Council, for talks described as "relationship maintenance" by Israeli sources.

Abrams, who is in charge of White House relations with Israel, reportedly informed Sharon of administration demands that Israel fulfill its promise to dismantle illegal outposts and freeze settlement construction.

Abrams apparently also told Sharon of the administration's intention to deduct the cost of the security fence from U.S. loan guarantees to Israel. Sharon informed Abrams of his intentions to initiate "unilateral measures" in the territories, and said he was examining various ideas, which he did not elaborate on.

The Sharon-Abrams meeting took place last Monday, two days before the speech in London by U.S. President George W. Bush in which Bush presented his demands on Israel and repeated his call for a change in Palestinian leadership.

In a meeting Sunday, called by Sharon, between the prime minister and Industry and Trade Minister Ehud Olmert, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz and Justice Minister Yosef Lapid, Sharon did not elaborate on his "unilateral steps."

Sharon told the ministers that the Palestinians are demanding concessions and gestures from Israel as a condition for the expected meeting between himself and Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia. "We will sit with them, but we have no intention of compromising with them before we see what they will do," Sharon said.

Preparatory talks were expected to take place this week between Sharon's bureau chief Dov Weisglass and senior Palestinian officials.

The Sharon-Qureia meeting was expected to take place next week. Late Monday, however, the PA announced that Qureia had accepted a recommendation by participants in the so-called Geneva Accords to postpone his meeting with Sharon until after the official signing ceremony for the accords in the beginning of December.

Qureia accepted the view that the signing of the accords would generate international and internal pressure on Sharon that may benefit the Palestinians ahead of the meeting.

On Monday, Qureia told the Al-Jazeera satellite news station that Sharon will find a serious partner in the Palestinians if the seriousness is reciprocated and if Israel implements Palestinian demands such as releasing prisoners, halting construction of the separation fence and ceasing settlement activities – steps that would show Sharon wanted to turn over a new leaf in his relations with the PA.

A date has yet to be set for the meeting with Sharon, Qureia added, repeating his opinion that the groundwork must be carefully laid for the meeting so that it generates favourable results for both sides.

At their meeting with Sharon, Shalom and Mofaz reportedly said they did not believe a ceasefire would hold up if terror infrastructure is not dismantled in the territories. Lapid suggested holding a discussion about a change in the route of the security fence, which was opposed by Olmert, Shalom, and Mofaz.

William Burns, U.S. assistant secretary of state for the Near East, is due to arrive in the region next week. Burns' visit is seen as part of U.S. measures to pressure the PA into working harder to investigate the killing last month of three U.S. security guards in an attack on a convoy in Gaza, and Burns is expected to bring up the issue with Qureia.

About 10 days ago, U.S. and Israeli officials met in Washington, D.C., in another of their periodic discussions about the war on terror. The members of the Israeli delegation, headed by Danny Arditi, who heads the counter-terrorism task force in the Prime Minister's Office, heard harsh criticism about faulty Palestinian co-operation in the investigation of the Gaza attack.

Freeze leads Sharon to change his position

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will soon present a new political initiative that will probably include unilateral steps for withdrawing from the territories.

He is reluctant to give details, preferring to prepare public opinion and the political system gradually for the turnaround in his position. But the talk about "painful concessions" and changes in the Israel Defence Forces deployment that would "make things easier for Israel" and do not depend on parallel Palestinian steps or on understandings with Washington, imply that he means moving settlements or, at least, is approaching such a decision.

Analysis

Until now, Sharon had ruled out unilateral steps. He had declared his readiness for concessions and establishing a Palestinian state, but conditioned any progress on stopping terror and getting rid of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. Sharon had rejected proposals for an Israeli political initiative, and refused to hear of evacuating settlements, although he would not commit to avoid doing so. His official position was that the debate on the future of the settlements, with the exception of freezing settlements and evacuating illegal outposts, would take place only in the context of negotiations for a permanent agreement.

But a unilateral withdrawal does not depend on negotiations, and Sharon does not intend to discuss it at his upcoming meeting with new PA Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia. So what caused a change in Sharon's position? In private conversations, he speaks of a new analysis that led him to conclude that this is the right move. It is not hard to detect the reasons for it. The political freeze with the Palestinians presented Sharon with a problem vis-a-vis the public. The relative calm in terrorism has led to a breakdown in the national consensus that Israel enjoyed during three years of war with the Palestinians. Suddenly, left-wing peace initiatives such as the Geneva accords have emerged, while the chief of staff has criticized the cabinet's policy and Sharon's popularity, which had soared, has plunged. Sharon realized he must once again demonstrate leadership and lead the national agenda.

He knows his new initiative will raise objections on the right, but he is convinced he will be able to muster a majority in cabinet, as he did in previous controversial decisions. From this point of view, the recent decision on the prisoner exchange deal with Hezbollah was a prelude for a new move.

Sharon's new proposals came as a surprise, and as of Sunday, he had not shared them with his ministers, only hinting at them to the Americans. The first political test of his plan came Monday when he confronted questions from his ministers. But the ideas for changing the IDF's deployment in the territories are not new. About two years ago, the head of the IDF's strategic brigade, Col. Eival Giladi, presented a plan to evacuate the settlements in Gaza and seven isolated settlements in the West Bank. The Giladi plan was not meant to appease the Palestinians but to serve Israeli interests by renouncing assets to improve security and strengthen international legitimacy.

The plan was shelved, the government denied its existence, and Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon publicly warned of withdrawal and settlement evacuation without an agreement, saying this would be seen as giving in to terrorism.

Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert believes that even a small withdrawal would arouse public controversy and sharp protest from the right, but would not solve the problem, so it would be better to make a more decisive move to set the border and leave as many Palestinians as possible beyond it.

So far, Sharon has avoided far-reaching steps, preferring to manage the confrontation with the Palestinians carefully and not take chances. Therefore, it would be better to wait until his initiative is fully published before assessing its seriousness and chances. However, it appears already that he is willing to change his position should circumstances force him to do so.

Steinhardt education proposal steals show at GA

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telgraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Imagine a world in which every Jewish newborn receives a voucher toward early childhood Jewish education and a free trip to Israel.

That's what philanthropist Michael Steinhardt asked 4,000 delegates to the North American Jewish federation system's General Assembly to consider last Wednesday.

The "Newborn Gift" would be part of an overall investment plan Steinhardt is proposing to strengthen Jewish education. He told delegates he was willing to contribute $10 million (all figures US) to the project, which he called the Fund for Our Jewish Future – on condition that his contribution represent no more than 10 per cent of the total fund.

In other words, the former Wall Street tycoon was challenging the audience to raise at least $90 million for Jewish education in the Diaspora.

Steinhardt said the proposal is a response to decreasing Jewish identification among non-Orthodox Diaspora Jews.

He mustered a litany of statistics to prove his point. Some 49 per cent of American Jews identify as secular; only 20 per cent give to Jewish causes, down from a post-World War II period when half the community gave to Jewish causes; and the number of American Jews is dwindling, according to the 2000-01 National Jewish Population Survey, he said.

"This part of the Diaspora community – its majority – is in crisis," Steinhardt said. While most Jewish activists focus on threats to Israel, in some respects the Diaspora is "far more vulnerable," he said.

"We don't know enough about our religion to take true pride in it. We remain Jewish on the vapours of cultural memory," Steinhardt said.

He also bemoaned what he called a glaring lack of Jewish leadership and innovative ideas.

By contrast, he pointed to the Birthright Israel program, which offers free trips to 18-26-year-olds who have never been on a peer tour to Israel. Steinhardt is one of the program's major funders.

"Birthright has been nothing less than a transformation in Jewish life," he said, but added that "the future of the program is tenuous – not because there are no young people who want to partake of this venture," but "simply because there's not enough money to pay for them."

While North American federations have raised hundreds of millions of dollars for Israel, it has difficulty raising "a fraction of that amount" for Birthright, Steinhardt said.

He called for a "Jewish renaissance for our young people," saying his plan would focus on the "centrality of Israel for the Jewish soul," the "pre-eminence of Jewish peoplehood," encouragement of vibrant rabbis, the principle of charity and the "imperative of a Jewish education."

He said, "Our survival depends on the next generation being educated."

The audience, which buzzed with electrified chatter after the speech, seemed to feel the same way. Many in the room found his proposal groundbreaking and rushed the stage to shake his hand.

Passing out flyers outside the auditorium, Jewish students said they would raise $500,000 for Steinhardt's fund.

Federation leaders largely praised the initiative, rejecting the idea that the appeal might undermine their own fundraising efforts, but said the challenge it poses is significant.

But as far as Steinhardt is concerned, the project is an imperative.

"The Jewish future of our children" is at stake, he said. "We owe our children nothing less."

The Week in Israel

Nov. 17

• Leaders of Turkey's Jewish community met with President Moshe Katsav at his residence in Jerusalem and discussed security issues in the wake of two terrorist attacks in Istanbul.

Nov. 18

• An ancient Jewish village was unearthed on the outskirts of Jerusalem. Some of the walls of the nearly 2,000-year-old village, discovered by archeologists, were still intact. The village is estimated to have been built around 60-70 C.E. and abandoned 70 years later during the Bar-Kochba Revolt. The village, located near the entrance to the present-day Shuafat refugee camp, was discovered during infrastructure work on Jerusalem's light-rail system.

Nov. 19

• An Ecuadorian tourist wounded in an attack at an Israeli-Jordanian border crossing near Eilat died after being taken to a Be'er Sheva hospital. Monica Patricia Teran Navarette, 33, was one of five Ecuadorian tourists injured in the shooting. The Palestinian man responsible for the attack was killed.

Nov. 20

• The push to bring to Israel some 20,000 Falash Mura – Ethiopians who claim Jewish ancestry – is gaining steam. The Jewish Agency for Israel's board of governors announced the agency would share the costs of the operation with the government of Israel.

Nov. 21

• The leader of Hezbollah, Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, said his guerrillas would retaliate fiercely if Israel attacked Lebanon and Syria. He made the remarks in Beirut before hundreds of unarmed Hezbollah members in military dress who paraded in front of him chanting "Israel must cease to exist."

Fini condemns his country's 'disgraceful past'

He held meetings with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom on Monday, and was expected to meet with opposition leader MK Shimon Peres and President Moshe Katsav later in his stay.

Israel followed Fini's moves skeptically for eight years before agreeing to invite him. Foreign Ministry sources said there were three reasons for inviting Fini now: his pro-Israel positions and firm objection to anti-Semitism; the fact that the United States and other countries have recognized him; and the position of the Italian Jewish community, which has gradually overcome its suspicion of and hostility toward him.

Alessandra Mussolini

In addition, Jerusalem looks favourably upon Fini's unwavering support of Sharon's policies – especially on the separation fence – which makes him the most prominent supporter of Sharon's government in Europe today.

The visit has received some criticism. Former deputy foreign minister Yossi Beilin called the visit a "disgrace to Israel." He hinted at political motives behind the visit, saying that "only because he supports the fence is he receiving a red carpet here."

Official sources at the Foreign Ministry responded by saying that Fini is accepted as a welcome visitor in nearly all western countries. In October 2001, he met with American Vice-President Dick Cheney, and in December 2002, with French Foreign Minister Dominique de Villepin. Last month in Spain, he met with Prime Minister Hose Maria Aznar.

Fini has been preparing for this visit for a long time. It is perceived as the culmination of an almost decade-long campaign to haul the National Alliance out of its post-fascist fringes and into the mainstream. In an interview with Ha'aretz in September 2002, he said that on this visit, he intends to assume historic responsibility for the fascists' crimes and ask for the Jewish people's forgiveness.

Considered one of the most brilliant and sophisticated politicians in Italy, Fini started out as a member of a racist youth movement. His left-wing rivals have embarrassed him in the past by quoting his praise of Mussolini, whom he once called "the greatest politician of the 20th century." Fini has since retracted that statement and denounced Mussolini.

For a long time, Israel refused to respond to his courtship. In 1997, for instance, the Foreign Ministry told four lawmakers from Fini's party who were about to visit Israel that they were not wanted.

The leaders of the Italian Jewish community also regarded him with suspicion and their pressure apparently led to the cancellation of his scheduled meeting with then-prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu in January 1996.

Undaunted, Fini continued his efforts. Last November, a minister of his party visited Israel for the first time. Earlier this year, Fini spoke at a meeting of the B'nai Brith organization in Milan in favour of the separation fence. Jerusalem sources said then: "Apart from converting, he has made every possible step to get closer to us and to Italy's Jews."

In related developments Alessandra Mussolini, granddaughter of Italy's World War II dictator and a member of parliament for the National Alliance, said in an interview with Ha'aretz Sunday that "not only Fini, but the entire world, including the Vatican and the Pope, should beg forgiveness of Israel."

The interview coincided with the Fini's arrival for his first official visit to Israel. Mussolini's statement is no small matter from someone who has declared: "My grandfather is the greatest of them all. I will continue to believe this all my life."

Her father, Romano Mussolini, once said Alessandra is "more of a Mussolini than me or the whole family put together."

When Fini retracted his statement that Mussolini was the greatest politician of the 20th century, Alessandra was so angry that she demonstratively crossed parliamentary lines to sit with members of the Forza Italia party instead of her own.

"In the end, he will circumcise you all," she taunted other members of her party, "so that Fini will finally be able to make his pilgrimage to Israel."

Of Fini himself, she declared: "I don't like politicians who try to distort history for their own purposes."

When asked what she thought of Fini's plan to apologize to the Jewish people, she said that, in her mind, he had already done so at the 1995 party conference in which Fini denounced anti-Semitism.

"What is important to me is that Fini listen to the people, as I did during my visits to Israel," she said.

Mussolini, then a movie actress, visited Israel 11 years ago, at which time she also visited Yad Vashem.

"I saw the piles of shoes and I was shocked. When I went outside, I saw soldiers walking around with guns, and I thought how sad it was that you are still not assured even of life itself," she recalled.

Most analysts view Fini's visit to Israel as an attempt to obtain a stamp of approval for the party's claim that it has abandoned its fascist roots. But Mussolini said the visit is important mainly because of "the [terrorist] assault on Italy and Europe."

The deaths of 19 Italian soldiers in a suicide bombing in Iraq and the recent terror attacks in Istanbul "make Italy Israel's ally," she explained.

Referring to a recent survey that found Europeans view Israel as the No. 1 threat to world peace, Mussolini declared that Europe is not afraid of Israel, but of terrorism.

Mussolini, a niece of movie star Sophia Loren, burst onto the political scene in 1992, when she was elected to parliament as a member of the neo-fascist party in her home district of Naples. Over the ensuing years, she made it clear that she was proud to be descended from Italy's dictator. But in an interview with La Republica earlier this month, she declared that the National Alliance has truly abandoned its neo-fascist past and that this was a natural development.

Asked what her grandfather would have thought of Fini, she replied: "I don't want to answer that. He is already dead and I'm a different person… My family is one thing and politics are another. Permit me not to answer that."

NRP, National Union threaten to leave coalition if settlements evacuated

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The National Religious Party and the National Union have made it clear to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that they will leave his coalition if the government decides on unilateral measures that include the evacuation of settlements.

But as long as steps amounted to mere talk, Ministers Effi Eitam and Avigdor Lieberman said they had no plans to make any rash moves.

Meanwhile, the head of the settlers' Knesset lobby, Likud MK Yehiel Hazan, said Sunday that if reports about plans to evacuate settlements were true, he would convene the Likud's Knesset faction to try to undermine any such moves.

"The settlement enterprise is one of the cornerstones of Zionism, and this would be one of the most serious mistakes in the history of the people of Israel," Hazan said. "Mere talk of intentions to evacuate causes immense damage and conveys weakness in the face of terror."

The NRP's Knesset whip, MK Shaul Yahalom, also said that talk of evacuating settlements constituted a victory for terrorism and that the NRP was opposed to any such moves. National Union whip, MK Yuri Stern, added that his party and the NRP would fight together "to prevent this madness from coming true."

Ford Foundation admits to aiding anti-Israel groups

By EDWIN BLACK

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a stunning reversal, the Ford Foundation has admitted it erred in funding anti-Israeli Palestinian groups and has vowed to establish tough new guidelines to stop its funds from being used for anti-Semitic activities anywhere in the world.

The group said it was "disgusted" by anti-Israel and anti-Semitic "agitation" action at the 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, which the foundation helped finance.

"We now recognize that we did not have a clear picture of the activities, organizations and people involved," conceded Ford president Susan Berresford in a Nov. 17 letter to U.S. Congressman Jerrold Nadler.

In addition to establishing new funding guidelines, the foundation's letter said the group promises to cease financing anti-Israel groups and even recover funds where the grant's intent was violated.

Ford's wide-ranging announcement was detailed in a five-page, single-spaced letter to Nadler after the politician circulated a petition signed by 20 members of Congress demanding that Ford halt its funding of anti-Israel hate groups.

Nadler's petition and Ford's letter came in the wake of a four-part JTA investigative series called "Funding Hate," which documented how Ford grantees were using the foundation's money to foment virulent anti-Israel and anti-Semitic agitation in the Middle East and worldwide – and in some cases, support for armed revolution in Israel.

The series prompted immediate congressional calls for an investigation from Nadler, Senator Rick Santorum and Senator Charles Grassley, the chair of the Senate Finance Committee.

There were also indications from the Internal Revenue Service, the State Department and the Justice Department that officials would review Ford's funding.

In her letter to Nadler, Berresford wrote, "Recent media stories have raised questions about the conduct of certain Palestinian grantees who participated in the 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, and the adequacy of the foundation's oversight of grantees. In response, foundation officers and trustees have discussed these stories with concerned individuals, making clear the numerous steps that the foundation takes to ensure the proper use of its funds."

"Having reassessed our own information on the Durban Conference," the letter said, "and in continuing talks with others, we now recognize that we did not have a complete picture of the activities, organizations and people involved. Although some Ford-supported grantee organizations repudiated the bigotry they witnessed in Durban, questions remain about others. More troubling still is the fact that many organizations among the large number at the conference did not respond at all.

"We deeply regret that foundation grantees may have taken part in unacceptable behavior in Durban," the Durban section of the letter concluded.

The Berresford letter completely reversed the earlier position of Ford Foundation vice-president Alexander Wilde.

In statements and letters to the editor, Wilde had insisted, "We do not believe" the events at Durban "can be described as 'agitation.'"

Nadler and representatives of Jewish groups that Ford officials met with after the publication of the JTA series praised the Ford Foundation's response. Foundation officials could not be reached for comment.

But Berresford promised more than just apologies. She pledged to take sweeping new preventive and monitoring measures to address revelations in the JTA investigation that Ford grantees were openly refusing to sign U.S. government funding guidelines designed to ensure that charitable donations in the Middle East don't end up in terrorist hands.

Those guidelines are known as the US Agency for International Development (USAID) Certification Regarding Terrorist Funding.

In a section of Berresford's letter called "Prevention of Funding for Terrorism," the Ford Foundation said it regularly checks approximately 4,000 active grantees against a State Department list to identify any that might be on the department's proscribed list.

"To date, we have found no matches," the letter said.

But, the letter continued, new measures will help ensure that funds will not be passed from one organization to another, or that Ford grantees will use other independent monies to promote violence or terrorism.

In addition, Berresford said, Ford will require additional measures "to make explicit our intolerance for unacceptable activity by any grantee organization."

She said Ford's standard grant-agreement letter, which grantees worldwide must sign to receive Ford funds, "will now include explicit language requiring the organization to agree that it will not promote violence or terrorism. This prohibition applies to all of the organization's funds, not just those provided through a grant from the Ford Foundation. Organizations unwilling to agree to these terms will not receive foundation support."

The Berresford letter also contained a section called "Prevention of Funding for Bigotry and the Destruction of any State," which declared that organizations promoting the delegitimization or destruction of Israel would be ineligible for funding.

"Grantees refusing to sign this agreement will not receive Foundation support," the letter said. "We will never support groups that promote or condone bigotry or violence, or that challenge the very existence of legitimate, sovereign states like Israel."

The Berresford letter also included a section called "Financial Oversight," in which Ford announced a major new auditing initiative.

"Ford will now reinforce its oversight with a new and expanded worldwide program of grantee audits. The foundation has engaged the international accounting firm KPMG to create a risk matrix that Ford will use to determine which grantees it will audit in the new augmented oversight program."

The new system, which could impact donors everywhere, will go into effect within weeks.

Greece to get tough on anti-Semitism

By JEAN COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ATHENS — Greece has introduced a new law to crack down on racism and anti-Semitism following charges that the country's media and government have fostered a climate that contributes to anti-Semitism.

Greeks found guilty of discriminating against religious or ethnic groups would face up to a year in prison under legislation presented last week by the Greek government following an increase in the number of racist and anti-Semitic incidents.

The legislation is expected to come up for a vote before the end of the year.

"The law will help reduce anti-Semitic incidents in Greece," said Moissis Costantini, president of the Central Jewish Board of Greece, an umbrella organization representing Greek Jews. "We are in touch with the government, and before the legislation is voted into law, we will suggest any amendments if needed."

Aside from cemetery desecrations, Greece has not seen the type of serious anti-Semitic acts – such as physical attacks on Jews – that have occurred in some parts of Europe since the Palestinian intifadah began three years ago.

However, the media and the intelligentsia have been fiercely anti-Israel, and some critics say they often cross the line into outright anti-Semitism. One prominent composer, Mikis Theodorakis, for example, recently caused a stir with a speech in which he proclaimed, in front of government officials, that Jews are "the root of all evil."

In addition, many critics charged that a recent exhibit at an Athens art gallery glorified Palestinian suicide bombers. The exhibit featured an embroidery montage showing an Arab woman in a bomb belt destroying an Israeli supermarket.

The stakes escalated late in the week when Greece announced that it would establish a national day of remembrance for Greek Jews who died in the Holocaust.

The country's Interior Ministry said it would submit legislation to Parliament making Jan. 27, the day prisoners were liberated from Auschwitz, a "Day of Remembrance of Greek Jewish Holocaust Victims."

More than 90 per cent of Greece's 80,000 Jews perished in Nazi death camps or during the German occupation of Greece in World War II.

Friday's announcement came a day after the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center issued a travel advisory urging Jews to avoid visiting Greece for the 2004 Olympics because of the alleged anti-Semitic climate.

"Failing a dramatic change in attitude and policy, the current atmosphere of hate and vilification can only escalate and could also poison the environment leading up to the 2004 Olympic Games," the centre's associate dean, Rabbi Abraham Cooper, said in the statement.

> More than 90 per cent of Greece's 80,000 Jews perished in Nazi death camps or during the German occupation of Greece in World War II

The Greek and Israeli governments and the Greek Jewish community harshly denounced the advisory.

"The Simon Wiesenthal Center is a private organization and does not represent the government of Israel," the Israeli Embassy in Athens said in a statement.

Israel "maintains excellent and friendly relations" with Greece, the embassy statement continued.

The Central Jewish Board issued a statement saying it "disagrees completely and expresses its sorrow regarding the 'travel advisory.'"

The group said the advisory is based on "isolated incidents" of anti-Semitism "and creates an impression that is far from reality."

Foreign Minister George Papandreou and Deputy Interior Minister Nikos Bistis have been leading the effort to rid Greece of its growing image as an anti-Semitic country.

Two weeks ago, the Jewish board met with Bistis to discuss creating a national Holocaust remembrance day in Greece.

Greece is the only European country that does not have a day of Holocaust remembrance, the group told Bistis.

Both Bistis and Greek's minister of culture, Vangelis Venizelos, promised a Greek Holocaust day.

This is not the first time Bistis has come to the assistance of Greek Jews. He has prominently condemned anti-Semitic incidents, even when other members of the government have hesitated.

The most recent example was after the twin synagogue bombings in Istanbul recently.

"This is what happens when the entire Jewish people is being indiscriminately blamed," Bistis said.

After Theodorakis called Jews "the root of all evil," the reactions of Israel and world Jewry stirred the Greek government to action.

Papandreou wrote to his counterpart in Israel, Silvan Shalom, asking for help in building a coalition of Greek Jews, Greek non-Jews and Jews worldwide to fight anti-Semitism in Greece.

Papandreou also sent a letter to the World Jewish Congress saying that if there is a resurgence of anti-Semitism in Europe, then Europe must tackle the problem actively.

"Attempts at moral relativism achieve little more than reinforcing anti-Semitism today and diminish the uniqueness of the Holocaust," he wrote.

Papandreou called Saturday's attack in Istanbul horrifying, saying it was "not only an attack on the Jewry of Istanbul, it symbolizes an attack on every innocent citizen in the world."

Meanwhile, Bistis talked to members of Greece's Parliament to line up support for the crackdown on anti-Semitism.

Confidence is the key to great cooking

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Daphna Rabinovitch, co-host with Elizabeth Baird and Emily Richards of Canadian Living Cooks on Food Network Canada, has the key to becoming a great cook.

"It all comes down to confidence; the more you cook the more confident you become, and confidence breeds variety," says Rabinovitch, author of Canadian Living Cooks Step by Step and co-author, along with Baird and Richards, of the new Canadian Living Cooks: 185 Showstopping Recipes from Canada's Favourite Cooks.

Most people have a repertoire of about 10 dishes, she says, "but if you introduce one or two new recipes, it can open up a whole new world.

"You just need to be organized and be pantry ready. With a well-stocked pantry you can make quick and delicious meals, even mid-week.

"You can even use your imagination a little. If you're making warm mushroom salad on garlic toast [see below], you can turn the dressing into a pasta sauce; if you've made a glaze for chicken, try it on salmon. More often than not, everything will come out," she says.

Rabinovitch, who says she is a super-taster because she can detect all the nuances in a dish, always has on hand in her home such items as good olive oil, balsamic vinegar, stewed tomatoes, coconut milk, dried beans, Asian and Mexican ingredients, and a big variety of noodles.

"Szechwan sauce is versatile; it can be used in stir fries, or on fish or tofu. Different noodles, such as rice noodles, make a completely different meal."

Cooking for company can be approached in two ways, she says. "You can practise your meal beforehand, or you can cook what you know. If you like the food, your guests will like it also.

"The tenor of entertaining has changed. The food is not casual, but it is beautiful and simple. Good food is good food; it does not have to be embellished. A good chicken soup, such as one made by my sister-in-law Lynda Roth, is a wonder to behold and a pleasure to eat."

Quoting food writer Richard Olney, Rabinovitch says the measure of a good cook is her roasted chicken. "That's what I would eat in any new restaurant."

Simple has its own mystique, she says. "If you have the interest and the will, you can entertain."

WARM MUSHROOM SALAD ON GARLIC TOASTS

1 piece (10 in.) baguette (French stick)
2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1 large clove garlic, halved
8 cups sliced mushrooms
½ tsp. dried thyme
¼ tsp. pepper
4 spinach or lettuce leaves
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

Dressing:
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
1 tsp. soy sauce
½ tsp. granulated sugar
¼ tsp. salt
2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil

Slice baguette diagonally into 12 slices, each ½-in. thick and 4 in. long. Brush both sides with all but 1 tsp. of the oil. Toast at 375 on rimmed baking sheet in oven, turning once, until firm and crusty, about 8 minutes. Immediately rub both sides with cut side of garlic halves; set aside. (Store in airtight container for up to 2 days.)

Meanwhile, in small bowl, whisk together vinegar, mustard, soy sauce, sugar and salt; whisk in oil. (Set aside for up to 4 hours. Whisk before continuing.)

In large nonstick skillet, heat remaining oil over medium-high heat, cook mushrooms, thyme and pepper, in batches if necessary, until browned and moisture is evaporated, about 10 minutes. Remove from heat. (Set aside for up to 2 hours. Reheat before continuing.) Pour dressing over top and toss to coat.

Place spinach leaf on each plate. Divide ½ cup of the mushroom mixture among 3 toasts and stack on 1 of the plates in spiral fashion, overlapping tips slightly. Repeat with remaining toasts and mushroom mixture. Sprinkle toasts and plate rims with parsley. Makes 4 servings.

BABY BOW TIE AND WALNUT PASTA SALAD

1½ cups farfallini pasta
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
½ onion, chopped
¾ cup chopped walnuts
½ cup chopped sweet green pepper
2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1 tbsp. cider vinegar
¼ tsp. salt
pinch pepper
2 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander
1 cup cherry tomatoes, quartered, or chopped tomatoes
fresh coriander sprigs

In skillet, toast ½ cup of the pasta over medium heat, stirring often, until light brown, about 5 minutes.

In saucepan of boiling salted water, cook toasted and remaining pasta until tender but firm, 7 to 8 minutes. Drain and rinse under cold water, drain well and set aside in large bowl.

In skillet, heat vegetable oil over medium heat and cook onion, stirring often, just until slightly softened, about 2 minutes. Add walnuts and cook for 2 minutes. Stir in green pepper and cook for 1 minute. Pour over plate; let cool.

In small bowl, whisk together olive oil, vinegar, salt and pepper; pour over pasta mixture. Add chopped coriander and toss to combine. (Cover and refrigerate for up to 24 hours.) Garnish with tomatoes and coriander sprigs. Makes 8 servings.

Note: When making a pasta salad, be sure to rinse the pasta under a spray of cold water. When the pasta dish is hot and sauced, skip the rinse so that the sauce will cling better.

CLASSIC ROAST CHICKEN AND GRAVY

1 chicken (about 5 lbs.)
½ onion
4 cloves garlic
½ lemon
1 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
¾ tsp. dried thyme
¼ tsp. crumbled dried rosemary
¼ tsp. each salt and pepper
2 tbsp. all-purpose flour¾ cup chicken stock

Preheat oven to 325. Remove giblets and neck, if present, from chicken. Rinse chicken inside and out; pat dry with paper towels. Place onion and garlic in cavity. Squeeze juice from lemon and set aside; add lemon half to cavity.

Tie legs together with kitchen string; tuck wings under back. Brush all over with oil; sprinkle with thyme, rosemary, salt and pepper. Place breast side up, on rack in roasting pan. Roast uncovered in oven, basting occasionally with pan juices, until juices run clear when thigh is pierced and meat thermometer inserted in high registers 185, about 1½ hours. Transfer chicken to platter and tent with oil foil. Let stand for 10 minutes before carving.

Skim fat from pan juices. Sprinkle flour over juices; cook over medium-high heat, whisking for 1 minute. Gradually pour in chicken stock and reserved lemon juice, whisking until smooth and thickened, about 3 minutes. Pour into warmed gravy boat.

Cut string holding legs together; discard onion, lemon and garlic. Using kitchen scissors, cut chicken into 2 breast and 2 leg portions. Cut each breast in half diagonally. Cut through each leg at joint to separate into drumsticks and thighs. Serve with gravy. Makes 6 servings.

Toronto doctor joins medical conference in Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Dr. Jerome (Jerry) Teitel describes it as "one of the most satisfying experiences I have ever had in my medical career."

A professor of medicine at the University of Toronto, he is referring to the First Canada/Israel Medical Conference, held recently in Ramat Gan.

The one-day conference, co-organized by the Israel Society of Internal Medicine, brought together Canadian and Israeli physicians.

"It was a great success," he said after returning from Israel.

Teitel took a lead role in organizing the conference on behalf of the Maimonides Society, an arm of United Jewish Appeal's medical division.

He considered his trip a "tangible expression of solidarity with our Israeli colleagues" and a "response to those unprincipled academics who have been trying to ostracize Israelis."

In his judgment, the conference was not merely an "empty exercise," but an important medical and scientific educational forum.

"I think we achieved both goals. Our colleagues were delighted and moved by our gesture, and we put together a high quality, valuable medical program."

Teitel hopes it will become an annual affair. "The tremendous attendance, which exceeded my most optimistic expectations, shows how highly valued it was by Israeli physicians. I hope the lure of a medical educational conference will attract additional Canadian participants."

Aside from himself, the Toronto organizers were Mark Freedman of UJA and Drs. Michael Gordon, Irv Gottesman, Howard Price, Brad Strauss and Zion Sasson.

In Israel, the coordinators were Moshe Mittelman, chair of the Israel Society of Internal Medicine, and Michael Lishner.

Several Israeli pharmaceutical companies were of invaluable help by providing grants, he said. They enabled the organizers to rent a conference venue, obtain audiovisual equipment, advertise the event and provide refreshments.

Teitel, head of hematology and oncology at St. Michael's Hospital, is impressed by the state of medicine in Israel.

"It is as technologically sophisticated as that in Canada, or any other western country.

"In fact, the contribution of Israelis to medical science has been disproportionately large both quantitatively and qualitatively."

GERARD ISRAEL

Dr. Jerome (Jerry) Teitel

Teitel, however, is concerned that Israel's "difficult economic situation will reduce the availability of quality care."

Teitel, who was born and raised in Toronto, is a busy man.

He divides his time between his classes at the University of Toronto, St. Michael's Hospital (where he is in charge of its hematology and oncology divisions) and the hospital's Inner City Health and hemophilia programs.

At the university, Teitel focuses on his area of specialization, hematology, which deals with the various diseases of the cells and proteins of the blood, bone marrow and lymph nodes.

He enjoys his role as a teacher immensely. "Medical students these days are so bright, accomplished and motivated that teaching them is a great pleasure. I'm lucky I can balance my professional activities among teaching, research, administrative work and clinical practice."

The ability to strike a balance, he explained, is one of the biggest advantages of being in academic medicine.

His other function at the university is heading up its hemostasis and thrombosis unit (which relates to disorders of excessive bleeding and clotting).

The St. Michael's Inner City Health program is an integral component of Teitel's commitment to the public health system.

"It has made health care to the downtown population a key aspect of our academic and corporate mission. A substantial proportion of these people are disadvantaged economically, socially, culturally, educationally and in many other ways."

The hemophilia program he directs is also of the utmost importance.

"The only other hemophilia program in Toronto is the pediatric one at Sick Kids, so between us we provide highly specialized medical care to a small group of patients with very difficult and challenging diseases."

Teitel, who was chair of Canada's National Blood Safety Council, believes that the blood supply in this country is safer than ever.

"We can have great confidence in the safety of the entire blood system in Canada. But this does not mean that we can become complacent and stop scrutinizing the system. It's a highly complex and expensive network, and unexpected threats, such as the West Nile virus this past summer, still need to be anticipated and dealt with."

Teitel's affiliation with the International AIDS Society in the 1990s stemmed from his treatment of hemophilia patients.

"HIV treatment has now become so sophisticated, and happily so effective, that doctors can devote all or most of their careers to it."

A radical cure still lies off in the distance. "For many patients in the developed world, HIV has become a chronic disease, like diabetes, arthritis and hypertension."

But in much of the rest of the world, treatment is virtually inaccessible, Teitel noted.

Teitel's parents, Shoshana and Irvin, were accomplished individuals.

A former librarian, she now works in the store fixture business. Producing radio dramas for CBC, he wrote a biographical play about Zionist theoretician Theodor Herzl that was dramatized on TV. In addition, he ran a successful advertising agency.

Teitel studied medicine, as did his brother David. Teitel was "always oriented to the sciences, and saw medical school as the best route to a scientific career."

But in time, the challenges and satisfactions of medicine lured him away "from the bench to the bedside."

Sharon Hampson raises awareness of breast cancer

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Children's entertainer and breast cancer advocate Sharon Hampson has been named the 2003 Jewish Women International of Canada Woman of Achievement.

Sharon Hampson

Hampson, part of the children's trio Sharon, Lois and Bram who received the Order of Canada last month, was honoured at JWI's recent convention for speaking out about her survival of breast cancer and for being one of the founders of Willow Breast Cancer Support and Resource Services.

Hampson was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1988 and 1993. The wife, mother and grandmother first went public about her struggle with the disease when she was asked to speak at the National Forum on Breast Cancer in 1993.

"I was a little hesitant at first, because by going public, I was taking my whole family with me," said Hampson in an interview.

But her family supported her decision to speak at the forum, she said, and her sister and daughter came with her for moral support.

"I spoke about the fear and trauma of being diagnosed, and about telling my children and parents.

"It was tough to speak about myself, but from that experience, I learned that my feelings were universal. A woman from Sri Lanka came up to me and said, 'Everything you said was about me.'

"Everything was different about us, but we were the same. We understood the value of sharing our feelings. It was a profound experience," said Hampson.

By speaking at the forum, along with professionals in the field, she said, "I was putting a face to the disease. It is important for health-care professionals to remember that they are dealing with people."

After the talk, Hampson's publicist urged her to get her message across to a larger audience by getting profiled in a magazine.

"Homemaker's magazine did a cover story, and [by talking about myself] I validated other women's feelings."

The March 1994 article had a big impact on other cancer survivors, and there was a move to create Willow – "a wonderful, unique resource service," Hampson said.

"People who need information can drop in or call. They can speak to someone who has had breast cancer, so the level of compassion and support is built in.

"In helping to create Willow, I learned about the strength of women. By working together, we can make something happen."

She said she has learned not to judge.

"Some women do not want to talk about themselves, but I cannot imagine holding on to a secret like that or operating without support. No one has to be alone."

Women should know about their treatment options, she said.

"They often feel overwhelmed and feel they have to decide immediately. That is the first terror response; you do not have to decide in a nanosecond. If you do not understand, there is no embarrassment in saying so."

There is a lot to learn when you are diagnosed with breast cancer, said Hampson, "and it makes you wiser in general ways, not only in that situation.

"You don't know about yourself until you face adversity. What I learned was that I needed a few days to cry, and then I picked myself up and got on with it.

"It's been an interesting journey. I've learned things and I've met fabulous women. I wish I could have done those things without having had breast cancer, but those were the cards that were dealt," she said.

You And Your Money.

A monthly feature by Michael Korman of Raymond James Ltd.

Things are not always what they appear to be! Recently, a colleague of mine at Raymond James Ltd. remarked about something one of his clients, a senior citizen, stated: "I would rather be safe with my money in Treasury Bills or GICs than risk my money in uncertain investments." I thought about this comment and came to the conclusion that the certainty of your capital is the uncertainty of your income.

Are there alternatives to help you prevent this uncertainty? Yes! Some investments — such as mutual funds or capital pools that hold preferred shares, income trusts, and different bonds with higher yields — may increase your total income; however, in these cases there are risks.

Systemic risk vs. non-systemic risk

The key to increased income from products such as mutual funds or capital pools resides in understanding the risks involved. Investments have two kinds of risks: systemic and non-systemic.

A systemic risk is one that affects an entire financial market, not just one company or business that participates in the market. For instance, an interest rate move represents the systemic (market) risk, while a credit downgrade of a company bond is a classic example of non-systemic risk. In my view, it is paramount that both of these are understood and managed within your stated tolerance levels.

Potential for higher yield

Today, more than ever, the individual investor is in search of income from income funds that may offer the potential for higher yield. These investments are not without risk. The key is to determine what factors affect the market value, and how much risk is involved in deriving your stream of income.

Over the past five years the average $25.00 Canadian bank preferred share has traded in a range of two to three dollars higher or lower than the par value. This movement is systemic (market) risk, a result of the interest yield curve. Recently we have seen sharp price movements in such issues as Atlas Cold Storage Income Trust and Legacy Hotel Real Estate Income Trusts, both of which are classic examples of non-systemic risk movements resulting from events specific to these businesses.

When it comes to risk and volatility we work very hard to understand, communicate and control both systemic and non-systemic risks for our clients. Many clients may feel they can tolerate market risk when, in fact, they have a terribly uneasy feeling about their money being worth less on paper for a period of time. The safety profile of your investments can improve your appetite for non-systemic risk specific to your investments, while your understanding of market or systemic risk can improve your understanding of how to enhance your family income in retirement.

Pettle play explores trust, betrayal and relationships

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Toronto playwright Adam Pettle's newest offering this season is Mosley and Me, running at CanStage-Berkeley Downstairs until Dec. 13.

"The play is set in a fictional bagel shop in Montreal," says Pettle, whose previous plays include the critically acclaimed Therac 25, Zaidie's Shoes and Sunday Father.

"It centres around a guy named Johnny Mosley who comes to work at Mitzy's Bagels, which is Nathan Mitz's family's bagel shop. They strike up this friendship. All the action takes place in the bagel shop, and the plot drive is towards this poker game that happens every Saturday night."

Pettle, who is currently a playwright-in-residence at CanStage, says he was commissioned to write a play for two people and wanted to challenge himself to set it in one location.

"I was in Montreal a year and a half ago and was walking down Fairmount, watching men make bagels," he says. "I thought it would be a great location and metaphor. The action I found really romantic, but it was also hot and claustrophobic."

Mosley and Me is about trust, brotherhood, betrayal and the loss of a relationship, he says.

"I think the loss of a relationship is the most tragic [theme] and a powerful one to see in the theatre."

It stars actor Randy Hughson as Johnny Mosley and actor/director/playwright Alex Poch-Goldin as Nathan Mitz.

"I worked with Randy before [he played the character of Bear in Zaidie's Shoes]," Pettle says. "He's a very visceral, instinctual and smart actor. Alex Poch-Goldin I've known for years. We've actually done a couple workshops together including the first incarnation of Sunday Father. He's a great writer, too."

Pettle's plays generally only have a handful of characters. He does that, he says, in part because if playwrights want their works to be produced, smaller casts make it easier for cash-strapped theatre companies to mount them.

Pettle says he also likes the challenge of holding an audience's attention with dramas consisting of two or three characters and an empty stage.

Currently, Pettle is developing a script commissioned by CanStage called Nassau and Lippincott, named for the intersection in Toronto's Kensington Market.

"It is about the same house in Kensington Market over three different eras. My grandparents grew up in Kensington Market and when I talked about moving back there, they were shocked because they spent their lives trying to get out," he says.

Pettle is also currently working on a made-for-television movie called ICU with producer Ilana Frank, the award-winning executive producer of the Eleventh Hour. He says he hopes this is the beginning of much future collaboration with Frank. He also hopes someday to find the right directors and producers for film adaptations of Therac 25 and Zaidie's Shoes.

Sunday Father and Zaidie's Shoes were both recently mounted in London, England, and are coming to Montreal and Winnipeg respectfully. Zaidie's Shoes is running at the Prairie Theatre Exchange in Winnpeg until Dec. 7, and Montrealers can catch Sunday Father at the Saidye Bronfman Centre from April 20 to May 9, 2004.

Tickets for Mosley and Me are available at CanStage customer service, 26 Berkeley St. or 27 Front St. E. or by calling 416-368-3110.

Adam Pettle, who is currently a playwright-in-residence at CanStage, says he was commissioned to write a play for two people and wanted to challenge himself to set it in one location.

A love story in a little whorehouse

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

When Toronto actor Avery Saltzman, 47, tries to close down a brothel in Best Little Whorehouse in Texas, playing at Stage West Theatre Restaurant, it won't be the first time.

Saltzman is reprising the role of Melvin P. Thorpe, which he performed at Stage West in Edmonton 12 years ago.

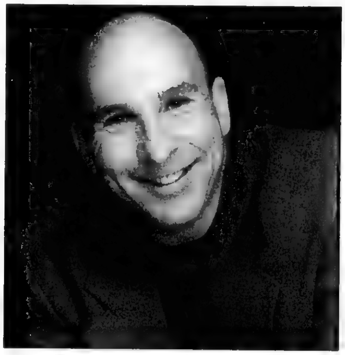
"Best Little Whorehouse opened on Broadway in the '80s, and then became a movie with Burt Reynolds and Dolly Parton. It is about a lady named Miss Mona who is running a house of ill repute.

"I play the character who it trying to shut it down. Melvin P. Thorpe hosts a TV show called Watchdog. The premise of the show is that he captures people who are not doing the right thing and puts them on television.

"He's a Southern Baptist TV evangelist – something for a nice Jewish boy," he says with a laugh.

Once again Saltzman will be acting opposite Karen K. Edissi who returns to the whorehouse as Miss Mona. The two go back to 1986, when they performed together in Kismet at the Royal Alex.

"Although it does take place in a whorehouse, it is basically a love story between the sheriff and Miss Mona. It is not the typical show, but it is a lot of fun with great musical numbers in it. It is a good show and it is already selling out."



Avery Saltzman

Saltzman is familiar to Stage West audiences; he has appeared in a number of productions, and has played opposite actors such actors as Elliott Gould and Gary Sandy of the '70s sitcom WKRP in Cincinnati.

Saltzman is also popular with audiences in New York, London and throughout Europe. While living in New York, he appeared both on and off Broadway, and appeared in a production of The Witch, performed half in Yiddish, at the Jewish Repertory Theater. Most recently, he was in Broadway's Candide with Jim Dale and Andrea Martin.

Over the last couple of summers he has toured Europe doing musical theatre in concert. These tours have produced show CDs including a new version of Man of La Mancha recorded at London's Abbey Road Studios, made famous by the Beatles.

Inspired by these concerts abroad, Saltzman is back home compiling songs for his own CD – his first.

He's just lent his voice to another recording project. "A new CD called Field of Stars is coming out, and features the music of Canadian musical theatre writers. I'm singing one of David Warrack's songs – Entertain," adds Saltzman.

The actor is no stranger to film and television; he was in the film Soul Food, and on a number of television shows including Queer as Folk, Doc, PSI Factor, Traders, Due South, Street Legal, Doogie Howser MD, Father Dowling Mysteries and In a Heartbeat. He'll soon be seen with Rae Dawn Chong in an episode of the new TV show Wild Card on Global Television Network.

For tickets to see Best Little Whorehouse in Texas, running until Feb. 15th, contact the Stage West Box Office at 905-238-0042 or 1-800-263-0684, or online at www.stagewest.com.

Director searches for 'righteous gentile'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Talk about the sandwich generation. Menachem Daum was a middle-aged man caught between the extremes of his father-in-law's and his own sons' thinking about the "outside world."

While Daum's haredi, Holocaust survivor father-in-law in New York was a bit extreme about interacting with non-Jews, Daum's two yeshiva-educated sons weren't far behind. To both, the world of the "goyim" was to be avoided at almost all costs, for it represented a contaminant, a secularizing force, the constant threat of evil and godlessness.

Daum, the product of an Orthodox yeshiva education himself and longtime resident of the chassidic New York neighbourhood of Boro Park, was worried.

He saw in this tunnel vision a potential for danger. As he put it, "this kind of Yiddishkeit closes off to the outside world," and he hoped his grandchildren would not inherit this sort of intolerance and insularity.

To Daum, this was also a matter of faith. After all, having faith in a post-Holocaust world was the ultimate challenge. Faith after the Shoah requires belief in the face of unanswerable questions. And if God made the universe, shouldn't everything and everyone in it at least have potential for good?

The final straw came when Daum's wife attended a lecture in New York by a radical rabbi. A tape recording of the talk more or less distills the rabbi's message as, "the only good gentile is a dead one."

Daum's two boys, who live and study full time in Israel, weren't quite at that point, conceding there are probably good gentiles out there. But the sons weren't prepared to say that Jews might regard non-Jews as having valid spiritual moorings.

Daum decided to do something to stanch the transmission of distrust and antipathy. He was intent on proving there was such a thing as a righteous gentile.

The resulting travelogue/documentary is Hiding and Seeking: Faith and Tolerance After the Holocaust, a poignant and touching film made by Daum that succeeds in knocking down, or at least disturbing, the wall between "us" and "them."

Screened recently as part of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival's four-part "Chai Tea and a Movie" series, Hiding and Seeking lays the groundwork for Daum's concerns, and then the clan hits the road to Poland. To his sons, like the descendants of many Polish Holocaust survivors, this is a country whose citizens are incurably anti-Semitic and beyond redemption.

But Daum has a mission: To find the Catholic farm family that hid the boys' grandfather and his two brothers for 26 months during World War II, thus ensuring the sons' very existence.

Things get interesting – and intense – when the aged children of the rescuers encounter the Daums, and remember every detail about the three boys who were hidden in a pit in the yard, undiscovered despite hair-raising searches by Nazi soldiers.

The elderly Poles, though flattered at the attention and praise lavished on them, are hurt because Daum's father-in-law had never acknowledged their heroism – not a letter of thanks or even a postcard in over 50 years.

Daum and his sons make no excuses, saying their relatives back home had been paralyzed by his post-war trauma, and felt the need to move forward. But they assure the Polish rescuers that the family's gratitude is endless.

The biggest change seems to come from Daum's sons. The boys even break down in tears when they recite a brachah for witnessing the site of a destroyed Jewish community.

Back in Poland a year later to attend the ceremony that bestowed Yad Vashem's Righteous Among the Nations status on the family, the sons come to realize, however grudgingly, that there is goodness, or its potential, in all people.

Off-colour Chanukah humour

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The breadth and scope of Jewish films is amazing. They include heavy dramas such as The Man in the Glass Booth, comedies such as Keeping the Faith, Yiddish classics such as Yidl Mitn Fidl, and German films such as the recent Nowhere in Africa.

Almost every kind of film is represented in the category of Jewish films. Within this single category there is bound to be something that will satisfy everyone's tastes – from the profound to the profane.

And speaking about the profane, Adam Sandler's Eight Crazy Nights, a film centred around the holiday of Chanukah, is certainly that. It is an animated musical comedy that can delight you, but it can also repulse you at the same time.

The film uses a lot of profanity and off-colour humour, but if you are able to overlook that and can concentrate on the positive elements in the film, it can also delight you. The ending gives you a warm, cozy feeling and everything eventually works out well for everyone.

The story revolves around Davey Stone, a 33-year old loser who lives in the small town of Dukesberry in New England. Davey gets drunk and offends everyone around him. He destroys the town's Santa and menorah ice sculptures and goes on a rampage that gets him arrested by the local police.

When brought up before the local judge, Davey's old basketball referee, Whitey, intervenes and gets the judge to release Davey into his custody.

Whitey undertakes the difficult task of straightening Davey out and getting Davey's life back on track.

Eventually we discover the reason for Davey's transformation from a nice kid to the town menace who hates everybody, including himself. And Whitey's predicament eventually gets Davey to think of someone other than himself.

Despite some gross humour, this is one of the few films that uses Chanukah as an important backdrop, and it does feature Sandler's latest version of his Chanukah Song as the final credits are scrolling up the screen. One of the DVD's extra features is a film clip of Sandler doing this song before a live audience.

The film uses the voices of Adam Sandler, Kevin Nealon, Rob Schneider and Jon Lovitz, all of whom are buddies of Sandler from Saturday Night Live. It was released by Columbia TriStar Home Entertainment.

Another recent release on DVD, although the video has been available for a number of years, is Black Sunday. This 1976 action packed thriller, based on a novel by Silence of the Lambs author Thomas Harris, tells the exciting story of a Black September terrorist group planning to blow up a Goodyear blimp while the vehicle is hovering over a football stadium filled with 80,000 people. An Israeli commando learns about the plot and tries to intervene before the terrorists can execute their plans.

Robert Shaw and Bruce Dern headline this high energy film that opens with an Israeli commando raid on a terrorist cell in Beirut and progresses to higher levels as it moves along.

Black Sunday is distributed by Paramount Pictures Home Video.

TRAVEL TALK

KIEVER SYNAGOGUE MISSION TO ISRAEL IS IDEAL FOR FIRST-TIME VISITORS

Participants in the Kiever Synagogue's planned upcoming mission to Israel will visit the holy sites in Jerusalem, Tiberias and Safed, as well as the Dead Sea area, says Rabbi Gary Zweig.

The Kiever mission will have personal meetings with a sofer (a scribe for Torahs, tfillin and mezuzot), an IDF officer, victims of terror and other Israelis, said Rabbi Zweig, who studied in Jerusalem for five years and has been back to Israel numerous times since.

"There are a lot of extras we plan to do. There'll even be an option to visit Hebron," he said.

Rabbi Zweig hopes to get 10 to 15 participants to join the one-week mission, which he said was ideally suited to people who have never been to Israel or haven't been there for years. Travel is on El Al Israel Airlines, with an anticipated departure date of Feb. 3, 2004. "We'll be in Jerusalem for Tu b'Shvat," he said.

The mission is open to all interested parties, not just members of the 170-family Kiever Synagogue, which is located on Bellevue Avenue in the Kensington Market area of downtown Toronto. Anyone interested in joining the mission is asked to contact Rabbi Zweig as soon as possible at 416-977-3502 or by e-mail at reingar@pathcom.com.

Showing Support for Israel: Speaking of missions to Israel, more than 275 Torontonians joined the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's B'Yachad mission to Israel earlier this month, the federation's largest in five years.

The mission coincided with the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities, a large gathering in Jerusalem of Jewish community leaders from around the globe. Canadians made up about 15 per cent of the GA's roughly 4,000 participants; seven per cent were from Toronto alone.

Travel Agent Profile: Stanley Lupka has been a travel agent for 22 years, most recently as groups manager of Thornhill-based Manor Travel.

He entered the profession after a Grade 13 trip he took with Bathurst Heights Collegiate to Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec City. "I got the travel bug" after that trip, he explains. "I knew right then I would travel or be in the industry. Now I am doing both."

Lupka's specialty is seniors travel, and he accompanies every group that he books. He has taken 32 seniors groups so far on five-day excursions to Washington, D.C., and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

This is the fourth year in a row in which he'll be taking a group down to Miami Beach, he says. "I'm down there for six weeks. We stay at the Monaco Ocean Front Resort in North Miami Beach."

Lupka advises travellers who are making their own hotel bookings to be careful.

"If you pay less for your hotel, you'll have a lower star hotel. In certain countries a two- or three-star hotel would be fine. However, if you are going to Cuba, the Dominican Republic or several other places, avoid two- or three-star hotels or you may end up having a regrettable time."

Lupka says he keeps informed about all news that could affect travel destinations, and recommends that travellers find a reliable and knowledgeable agent.

"You need a good travel agent to ask all of the right questions, and with the knowledge about which company to use to get the best vacations at the best prices."

Film for people of all faiths

The Daums and the father-in-law went on to establish an educational fund for the descendants of the Polish family.

In a brief CJN interview, Daum described the work "as a film for people of all religions. I hope this film is seen by people of all faiths as a call to question how we relate to others."

Daum believes the greatest danger today comes from people who claim to be religious, yet are blind to the divine spark within every person. His invitation to self-examination shows it's possible to be true to one's faith and still feel a profound sense of kinship to "the other."

In the end, Daum hopes he's softened the hearts of his sons and planted the seed of an "ethical will" – not an easy task, he concedes, because the haredi world tends to shy from self-criticism.

The film's ultimate lesson, as Daum puts it, is "you can't write off everybody."

Hiding and Seeking will be screened at January's New York Jewish Film Festival and is slated to be televised on PBS next fall.

Paradise Lost examines Israel's Arab minority

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Paradise Lost, a TVOntario film scheduled to be broadcast on Wednesday, Dec. 3 at 10 p.m., is a revealing portrait of two Israeli Muslim Arab women who buck the conventions of their conservative milieu.

Ebitsam Mara'ana, 27, is an iconoclastic and inquisitive filmmaker who regards an older Arab woman, Suaad Genem, as a role model.

They both hail from Fureidis, a tidy Arab village in the foothills of the Carmel mountain range facing the Mediterranean Sea.

As it happens, Fureidis was one of the few Arab coastal villages not attacked by Jewish forces during the 1948 War of Independence.

As this intriguing documentary starts, Ebitsam is full of questions about a supposed massacre of Arabs that took place around Fureidis during the war. No one, including her grizzled father, wants to discuss this troubling issue. In fact, he urges his daughter to avoid "politics."

The incident remains shrouded in a conspiracy of silence, and is symptomatic of the accomodationist attitude some Israeli Arabs have adopted toward the state of Israel.

Neither is anyone in the village willing to talk about Ebitsam's heroine, Suaad, who no longer resides in Fureidis.

Suaad, a Palestinian nationalist, incurred the wrath of the Israeli authorities years ago, and has become something of a legendary, if not misunderstood, figure in Fureidis.

As Ebitsam searches for answers, the film doubles back to her status as a single young woman who has left Fureidis, and currently lives in Tel Aviv.

Clearly, she is an anomaly in a traditional Muslim society, where women are married off in their late teens or early '20s and have little or no direct contact with Israeli Jews.

When Ebitsam discovers that Suaad is now in London, England, she calls her and sets up a meeting. Like Ebitsam, Suaad is a free spirit, but far more political.

Suaad, who holds a PhD in international law and is married to an Englishman, is deliberately vague about her past.

But when she returns to Fureidis on a summer visit, she is a bit more forthcoming. Ebitsam learns she was apparently charged with maintaining illegal contacts with the PLO when it was a banned organization, and then arrested and imprisoned.

Surprisingly, Suaad urges Ebitsam not to leave Fureidis. She never spells out her reasons. But Ebitsam ignores her advice, and concludes she does not wish to model herself after Suaad after all.

Paradise Lost, an Israel TV and TVOntario joint production, is a fascinating glimpse into the nature of tradition, identity and disaffection in the Israeli Arab community.

It is filmmaking of a high calibre.

Elberg story in new issue of Parchment

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Yehuda Elberg, the celebrated Yiddish author who died Oct.18 in Montreal, had agreed last year to publish one of his short stories in Parchment, the journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing.

At the recent launch of the journal's 12th issue at the Miles Nadal JCC in Toronto, editor Adam Fuerstenberg lamented that Elberg had not lived to see his story into print.

As translated by Miriam Dashkin Beckerman, the story — titled "The Parchment Note: A Story of Hassidic Lore" – fills 22 pages of the 210-page journal; another 19 pages is taken up by the original Yiddish manuscript.

Elberg, who gained international attention when his novels Ship of The Hunted and The Empire of Kalman the Cripple were translated into English six years ago, is one of relatively few well-established writers to appear in Parchment.

According to Fuerstenberg, most are young creative writers seeking outlets for thematically Jewish works that may not be suitable for more mainstream literary publications.

"That's the special thing about Parchment," he said. "We obviously have seasoned and established writers, but we also offer an opportunity for young and beginning writers to get into print."

Some writers and editors at the Parchment launch included, from left, front row: Miriam Beckerman (translator), Karen Shenfeld, Merle Nudelman. Back row: Anne Dublin, Bernard Katz (prose editor), Malca Litovitz, Bill Gladstone, Rafi Aron, Adam Fuerstenberg (editor).

Besides Elberg's Chassidic tale, the current issue contains nine more stories, one essay and contributions from 14 poets. Two of the poets, Merle Nudelman and Elana Wolf, thanked Fuerstenberg during their readings for his encouragement. Both said they had gone on to produce volumes of poetry after publishing early material in Parchment.

(Nudelman's freshly-minted first volume of poetry, Borrowed Light, was on sale at the launch, as was another newly-printed opus by a Parchment poet – At the Moonbeam Café, by Malca Litovitz. Each is a slim attractive volume, published by Guernica Editions of Toronto.)

The current Parchment also features a story by Avner Mandelman, who is currently a finalist for the $10,000 Journey prize. A previous Mandelman story, "Cuckoo", which appeared in the previous issue of Parchment, was one of 10 stories accepted for the current Journey Anthology. (The Oberon Press is soon to publish a collection of Mandelman's short stories.)

As Fuerstenberg mentioned, Parchment has long basked in the reflected glory of contributors who have gone on to greater things. Anne Michaels, for example, was a contributor before soaring to literary celebrity with her award-winning debut novel, Fugitive Pieces. And Lillian Nattel submitted a chapter from a work-in-progress that would become The River Midnight, her bestselling novel of shtetl life.

"We like to nurture talent," said Fuerstenberg. "That's the real reason for Parchment's existence."

Parchment No. 12 is dedicated to the late Izzy Asper, "defender and champion of Israel, of Jews everywhere, and of univeral human rights." It is available by sending a cheque for $12 to Parchment, Centre for Jewish Studies, Vanier 260, York University, 4700 Keele St., Toronto Ont. M3J 1P3. A two-year subscription is $20.

Little guy who hits a ton in championship game

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If any sport has become dominated by big, even oversized athletes, it's got to be football. Whether it's at the pro level, in college or even in high school, players are big, really big.

But to every rule, there's an exception and if you check the starting lineup of the Northern Red Knights, you'll find one of the more successful little men in Toronto high school football.

Patrolling the defence, in the interior no less, is inside linebacker Ely Matlow, a diminutive and lightweight player whose size – 5-5, 140 pounds – belies the fact he packs a mighty punch and plays the game fearlessly and with gusto.

There aren't too many players that small in competitive football, even at the high school level. In the Ontario Federation of Schools' Athletic Association (OFSAA), linemen typically tip the scales around 250 and most linebackers play at around 210 lbs.

Yet from the second game of the season on, Matlow earned a spot on the Red Knights, and last weekend he was part of the the squad that lost 25-21 to Cedarbrae Colts in the Metro Bowl, the Toronto championship. The game, played at SkyDome, was part of a weekend extravaganza that included a series of regional OFSAA championships and culminated in the Vanier Cup, Canadian college football's championship game.

Matlow is a valuable part of the Red Knights' defence, noted the team's head coach, Dan Dominico. "He's a small guy but he has a lot of heart. He refuses to quit. He gets knocked down and he gets back up again."

Calling Matlow one of the team's better linebackers, Dominico said he shows a good knowledge of positional play and has "good football instincts."

"He's always in a good hitting position, he's very enthusiastic and he loves contact," Dominico said.

What's more, because of his size, or lack of it, he inspires his teammates to excel, the coach added.

Matlow is particularly effective against the run – a key point since most teams in the league other than the Red Knights are running teams.

One of two inside linebackers in the Red Knights' four-linebacker system, Matlow said he gravitated to that position because "you get to hit. That's the main reason I like being there."

Being compact in size can be turned to your advantage, he said. Effective hitters get low to the ground and in that respect, he enjoys a head start on other players.

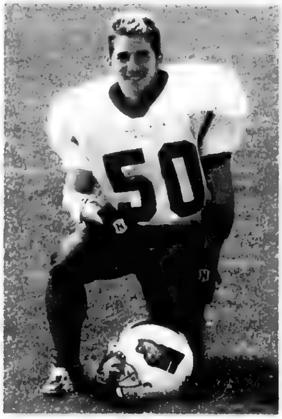
"This is my motto. I tell my parents the same thing. You can't run without legs, so you've got to hit low and take down the legs."

Matlow, who professes "a passion for football," models himself on linebacker Zach Thomas of the Miami Dolphins, who's also "short, white, compact, sort of like me. I kinda' enjoy watching him."

Ely's father, Avery, said Ely's teammates call him "the Tasmanian Devil. When you look in his eyes, it's scary. He sees things like Wayne Gretzky saw things on the ice, and he's quick."

Other teams have tended to underestimate his abilities, Ely said. "When teams first see me, they don't think I'm for real."

But throughout his football career, Matlow has surprised bigger players and earned recognition of his abilities. Two years ago in his summer league, the Central Ontario Minor Football League, he received the Pride and Effort Award from his team, the North York Grizzlies. Last season, he was named defensive player of the year and he led the league in tackles and defensive touchdowns.



Ely Matlow

When he transferred to Northern from Vaughan Secondary at the beginning of the current school year, the 16-year-old Grade 11 student knew he might have to overcome some low expectations.

At the beginning of training camp, "I said to my coach, 'I'm short, white and Jewish and that's not the best for football, but give me my best shot.'"

Although he rode the pines in the Red Knights' first game, he earned a starting position in game two. He hasn't looked back since.

The Red Knights, which has produced such CFL luminaries as Neil Lumsden and Leif Petterson, racked up a perfect 7-0 record but lost to Richview in the quarter-finals in a game that determined playoff seeding. In the semi-final, the team bounced back to defeat St. Michael's Kerry Blues, the reigning high school champs, by a decisive 23-9 margin. Their championship matchup against Cedarbrae marked the first time this season the two teams tangled.

New owners foresee rekindling Argo brand

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Year after year, the CFL scores well with Toronto football fans – at least in television ratings – and the Grey Cup game attracts millions of viewers across Canada, making it the top rated sports entertainment event of the year.

Yet the Toronto Argonauts, the CFL's oldest and most storied franchise, situated in the league's largest population centre, consistently draws pitifully small crowds. In the cavernous SkyDome, a typical crowd of 15,000 appears embarassingly tiny.

Given the city's large population base and its concentration of corporate head offices, it's an apparently anomalous situation. Over the past 30 years, several owners have tried their hands at turning the team around, yet all have been roundly disappointed.

Enter Howard Sokolowski and David Cynamon, two youthful, dynamic and highly successful entrepreneurs who took over the Argos recently.

Longtime fans of the CFL, the pair believe the Argos are an undervalued brand acquired at a rock bottom price. Where others see red ink, they see dollar signs. Where others see a team with little public interest, they see a team with deep roots in the community. Where cynics say the city will never support a CFL team, they see a 25,000-seat outdoor stadium full of rabid fans.

In fact, a new 25,000-seat stadium coupled with a marketing drive to broaden the team's appeal are at the core of the pair's strategic vision for making the team a success in Toronto.

Plans for a new stadium will be revealed in four or five months, they say. But before it is completed, the organization they are setting in place will have to go out to the community to attract new fans and reclaim a lost generation of young people whose formative sporting lives were not moulded by interest in the team.

Part of that effort will include bringing the players into schools, community centres and other venues where people can see and "touch" the athletes that for many seem remote, said Cynamon.

The team's promotions will include reaching out to various ethnic communities in the city of Toronto, including the Jewish community, said Sokolowski, CEO of Tribute Communities, a major developer in the Toronto area.

"It would be wonderful to have a game to salute the Jewish community," he said, with other games dedicated to other Toronto communities. Such a game might include bringing in ex-Argos like Gerry Sternberg, who played for several CFL teams from 1965-72, and other Jewish players, he added.

Sokolowski, who served as co-chair of last year's UJA Federation emergency campaign for Israel, and Cynamon, head of KIK Corporation, took over the team from the CFL, which ran the organization when its most recent owner, New York-based Sherwood Schwartz, failed to pay its bills.

Both new owners profess to be lifelong CFL fans. Growing up in Edmonton, Cynamon lived and died with his beloved Eskimos. Once, as a youngster, he met quarterback Warren Moon and felt "committed" to him for life.

That sort of personalized promotion of the team will create fan loyalty that will last for years, he said. The new stadium, he added, will bring fans to the game and put them close to the action, unlike in the cavernous SkyDome. The new ownership team would like to make the team more accessible to fans by allowing kids to run onto the field after the game, the way Cynamon remembers games out west. Games will exude a festival atmosphere, with face painting, marching bands and parties, he added.

But can he recreate the atmosphere of football-mad Western Canada in "world class" – and somewhat condescending – Toronto?

Over the long haul, Cynamon believes they can. "I think there's a CFL fan in everyone," he said.

"It is what it is," said Cynamon, who played slotback for four years at York University in the early 1980s. "We're not the NFL. [The CFL] is a value brand with good pricing."

Sokolowski believes that with the type of local ownership they will provide, the Argos will have a better connection to the community and an understanding of the local market that the team's recent absentee owners did not.

Where is courage in the Diaspora?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

What is wrong with the Diaspora consciousness?

Why do we feel sickened by anti-Semitic attacks in Turkey and around the world, yet leave the job of fighting hatred up to Israel and organizations? Why do thousands of Jews in 2003 attend Holocaust Week programming, yet take a neutral stand on the suffering of Jews and others?

It doesn't make sense. If Holocaust Education is not "a call to arms," then what is it? Is it entertainment? Where is our bravery? Where is our daring? Why are we not boldly and actively brawling with inequities and pursuing peace?

Rather than being so comfortable, wouldn't it be wiser to pursue options such as the financing and development of workshops on self-defence and peace negotiations?

Shouldn't our schools, together with Jewish philanthropists, develop programs for our children so that they are physically able to shield themselves and have the mental agility and know-how to respond to lunatic lies spewed by anti-Semites, as well as the tools to build stronger relationships with non-Jews who do not hate us?

Why aren't we working with Jewishly owned marketing companies to disseminate the beautiful truth about the Jewish people, including our fierce desire for peace? Where are the grassroots movements composed of regular community members for the protection of the Jewish people and for outreach to our friends?

We must ask ourselves: when did the links in the chain of consciousness break? Why did most Jews not listen to Ze'ev Jabotinsky when he told them to flee eastern Europe? Why didn't most Jews in the West barrage their governments when news about the concentration camps began to leak? How come today, even though we know anti-Semitism is spreading, will few of us pound on the doors of our rabbis' and community leaders' homes, demanding a thoughtful and creative game plan in which we all play a considerable and vital role in assisting our people?

We will be judged in history by future generations of Jews. They will wonder if the Canadian Jewish community did everything it could to pursue peace and fight hate, when we had the luxury to do so. Historians might ask why we spent millions of dollars on Holocaust education and monuments if not, at least in part, to compel our generation to vigorously pursue peace.

We were victims of terror and insanity. Let nobody tell us otherwise. It is time, however, for Diaspora Jews who are able to divest themselves of the mental baggage of victimization that prevents the development of a pro-active plan to bring peace to the Jewish people and the world. It is time Israelis stop bearing the entire burden of fighting our enemies and searching for peaceful partnerships.

The Toronto Jewish community can be a light unto other Diaspora Jewish communities. We can test the waters of hasbarah and activism, and then tell everyone else how we did it.

It is already three years that I am calling upon you, Polish Jewry... I became gray and old in these years, my heart bleeds, that you, dear brother and sisters, do not see the volcano which will soon begin to spit its all-consuming lava. If you do believe me, then listen to me in this 12th hour: In the name of God! Let anyone of you save himself, as long as there is still time, and time there is very little. Eliminate the Diaspora or the Diaspora will surely eliminate you. – Zev Jabotinsky, two years before World War II.

Mandy Patinkin's Mom's Potato Latkes

6 large white potatoes
1 large onion
2 eggs (or 1/2 cup egg substitute)
2 egg whites
2/3 cup flour or matzo meal
1 tsp. baking powder
1.2 tsp. garlic powder
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. white pepper
peanut oil for frying

Peel potatoes and onion. (If not using immediately, place in cold water.) Grate with the shredding blade of food processor. Put grated potatoes in large strainer and press out liquid. Pour cold water over potatoes and press out liquid once more. Transfer to large mixing bowl. Add onions. Beat eggs and egg whites until thick. Add to potatoes and onions. Add flour or matzo meal, baking powder, and seasonings. Mix well. Heat oil in frying pan. When ready, drop batter by large soup spoonfuls to form oval shapes. Fry over moderate to high heat until brown on one side; turn to brown other side. Remove from frying pan and drain on paper towels. Serve with sour ceam or applesauce.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have a friend who went through some tough times in the last few years.

He had sunk into a deep depression and wouldn't let anyone in. His family and friends all tried to do whatever they could, but he kept sinking deeper.

One day he called me and began talking. He called almost daily, and I spent hours on the phone with him. I always dropped whatever I was doing to listen because I knew he needed me.

I'm happy to report that he has since recovered from his depression, and with the help of his doctor and I'd like to think me, he is back on his feet.

He now speaks to his family and other friends again, but he rarely calls me. I feel very hurt and used, but don't want to say anything for fear of sounding petty. Do you think I'm wrong to feel this way?

Feeling Used

Dear Feeling Used,

It's hard to know what's going through your friend's head.

The first thing that comes to my mind is that you may be a reminder of this dark time in his life. You were such a big part of him throughout his depression that he may be afraid that speaking to you will transport him to a place he doesn't want to be. Or it may be as simple as he is just busy living again and isn't thinking about what he is doing to you.

There is only one way to find out. You obviously are very close with your friend. He turned to you above all others in his life. I don't think it would be out of line for you to pick up the phone and discuss with him how you are feeling.

If you can spend some good times with him, either on the phone or in person, it will add to the way he thinks of you, not just as a makeshift therapist, but as someone he can share good times with too. You both need to make good memories together to mask some of the bad.

You are a good friend. Don't let your friendship stop now. You still need each other.

FOUR SEASONS HOTEL
Toronto

21 Avenue Road, Toronto, Ontario M5R 2G1

The King Edward Hotel: Where History and Tradition meet

When your simchah takes place at Le Royal Meridien King Edward, you know you are booked at one of the most luxurious settings in town.

Opened in 1903, the King Edward Hotel is celebrating 100 years of service this year.

Toronto's first luxury hotel, it offers an impressive array of guest rooms, suites, meeting rooms and corporate function rooms. This grand, traditional and historic building is located in the heart of Old Toronto, in today's financial district.

The hotel's two magnificent ballrooms and 12 conference rooms can be configured to meet your needs and can accommodate up to 350 guests.

Sharon J. Fraenkel is the newly appointed director of catering at the King Edward. At 33, he already has 12 years experience in the hospitality business at the Dan Hotels in Israel, Hilton Hotels in Germany and Montreal and the Ritz-Carlton Hotel Company. Sharon has just arrived in Toronto from the Ritz-Carlton in Montreal and he and his team look forward to providing their clients with their personal service and expertise.

Sharon J. Fraenkel

"We offer tailor-made menus from our kosher supplier GMB Culinary Productions, our prices are competitive and our elegant hotel setting and service are second to none," says Fraenkel, a graduate in International Hotel Management in Montreux, Switzerland.

"I feel that I have an advantage in dealing with the Jewish community because besides offering excellent service, I understand exactly what is needed, when a special request is being made for an Orthodox wedding ceremony or a kosher corporate business event. My ultimate goal would be to serve our Jewish clients from our very own kosher kitchen," says Fraenkel.

Born in Israel, raised and educated in Germany and Switzerland, Frankel came to Canada in 1997. He spent the last six years in Montreal, the last two as director of catering at the Ritz-Carlton.

With his experience, Fraenkel is convinced that he and his professional catering team will surprise and delight you, your family or your business colleagues at your next function with their personalized service and exceptional attention to detail.

Need to plan a kids' party? Don't panic

Help! We've Got Kids 10th edition has tons of ideas

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

If you think you'll never find another original party idea, check out Help! We've Got Kids (www.HelpWeveGot Kids.com), a children's resource directory for the GTA.

Now in its 10th edition, the directory, published by Elisa Morton Palter and Shari Wert, contains more than 2,000 different products, services, activities and programs for kids, as well as an updated coupon section.

The idea for the directory was conceived when Morton Palter and Shari Wert were both mothers of baby girls.

"We started talking about the need for flexible working hours for young mothers. We wanted to continue working, but we also wanted some balance in our lives."

They came up with a number of business ideas revolving around products and services for kids, but when they tried to research if such businesses already existed, they realized there was no comprehensive directory to consult.

"We suddenly realized that the directory could be the business," Wert said.

Their first book, which came out in 1984, contained 1,150 listings in 25 categories, and "we have grown and adapted in response to the comments and feedback of our readers," said Morton Palter.

Anyone who provides activities, services or products for children is eligible for a free listing, they said. "It has become so successful that parents refer to the directory as their bible, and 80 per cent of our advertisers renew annually."

For the first time this year, Wert and Morton Palter are offering bar/bat mitzvah listings. "As our book is growing, our readership is growing and they're referring to the directory. We need to keep up with them."

With listings on such services as caterers, decor specialists, invitations, venues, entertainers, disc jockeys, hair dressers and party favours, said Morton Palter, the book can save hosts a lot of time searching out names. Everything is in one place.

"Although we cannot guarantee all the services, we do ensure that every business in our book is legitimate. We want people to know what's out there and then make their own decisions," she said.

To fulfil their mandate to provide listings on everything parents may need, the pair have included information about such things as diaper services, financial services and groceries. The health and wellness section contains 24-hour pharmacies, after-hours clinics, dentists, nutritionists and first aid instruction.

Help! We've Got Kids is available at book stores as well as at www.HelpWeveGot Kids.com.

PARTY PLANNER

Party out of town, for a change

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

For families looking to celebrate a bar mitzvah abroad, Ehud Telem of Peerless Travel (905-886-5610 or 1-800-294-1663) recommends a two-week package trip to Israel.

"Tours to Israel are a very popular way of celebrating bar and bat mitzvahs," he says.

In 2000, more than 1,500 people went on Peerless Travel's trip, which has definite kid appeal. On the itinerary is an archeological dig, target shooting with real ammunition (and safety protection), camel rides, bathing in the Dead Sea and a visit to a Bedouin village, to name a few of the attractions.

The bar mitzvah ceremony itself is conducted at sunrise on Masada, following a brief tour of the site. A bar-mitzvah party – complete with lighting and special effects – takes place at the end of the trip, in Tel Aviv.

On this trip, "kids fall in love with Israel," says Telem.

While Telem acknowledges numbers are down because of the security situation in Israel, he insists the danger is a myth. The buses, drivers and guides all work closely with Peerless to ensure safety is a top priority.

Although people booking a last-minute trip can sometimes be accommodated if there is space, Telem recommends booking at least six to nine months in advance. He already has 150 people signed up for December and inquiries are streaming in about 2004 trips.

Sarah Pachter of Fisher-Fremont Travel (416-481-3323) also offers bar-mitzvah package trips to Israel. Depending on size and timing, Pachter may also lead the trip. To date, she has been to Israel more than 150 times.

And for newlyweds, there's no other way to begin married life than with a honeymoon. And one thing many such trips have in common, chuckles Peerless travel agent Karen Levy, is sun and a beach.

Hawaiian and Caribbean resorts such as Sandals are popular because they cater to couples, Levy says. For cruises, she recommends the Caribbean in winter and the Mediterranean or the Greek islands in summer.

But when it comes to booking your honeymoon, be sure to take a few things into consideration.

- Be realistic about your likes and dislikes. "If you're not a person who likes sitting on a beach for a week, you're still not going to like it on your honeymoon," she says. Look into vacations that match your hobbies. If you like art and culture, try Europe. Into archeology and ancient ruins? Check out Mexico. For adventure trips, Central American countries such as Costa Rica have mountain biking, whitewater rafting, jungle hikes and, of course, beaches.
- Know your budget. In recent years, the price of travel has gone up. Be realistic about what you can spend on a trip and work around your budget. There are trips out there for every price range.
- Travel in low season. Travelling is generally more expensive any time kids are off school, Levy says. Even if it's not the week after your wedding, you'll save a bundle if you avoid travelling during the last two weeks of December, the last two weeks of February and during March Break.
- Be flexible with dates and the number of days. Friday to Monday is the most expensive time of the week to fly. Sometimes there are deals available if you arrive during the week. Ten-day trips can be more practical than two full weeks.
- Look at transportation. Airfare can be the most expensive part of a trip. Levy says that if you're taking a cruise, think about driving to Florida, or drive to Buffalo and catch a flight from there.

Set expectations high with your invitations

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Here's a party-planning riddle: What is the first clue to a party's vibe that uses such sexy features as champagne ink and embossed tassels?

You guessed it, invitations – the age-old bearer of good fortune.

"Invitations set the tone," says Barbara Mortfield of Invitations by Barbara (905-738-1232). For 35 years, Mortfield's home business has crafted hundreds of thousands of invites under the motto, "It should not be expensive but look expensive."

Mortfield has noticed clients opting for simplicity over opulence. Less is more has replaced bigger is better, even in recent trends.

"See-through topping used to be in style but now it looks cheap," she says.

> 'See-through topping used to be in style but now it looks cheap'

Letter-press invitations are gaining popularity, says Gail Shapiro, who makes hand-made invitations at Paper Expressions (905-764-9812). As the opposite of raised lettering, the invite's words are indented into the paper, creating grooves stylish to sight and touch.

For Jewish themes, many invitation companies offer Hebrew writing and images of Torah scrolls and Stars of David to hug the words.

Most importantly, the invitation should reflect the party.

Shapiro asks clients if their bar or bat mitzvah function is a morning or evening affair, which reflects directly on the invitation.

"You shouldn't go crazy with design for a twilight service," Shapiro says.

On bar mitzvahs, Mortfield says, "These are religious ceremonies, and you don't want your invitation to look too garish."

She suggests "fun stuff" for bar mitzvahs, such as multi-coloured layers, floating images and raised lettering. Save the wacky ideas, such as bright green turtle illustrations, for the seating cards, she says.

"The invitation should match the room," Shapiro says, noting that a gold-edged invitation will compliment a gold-curtained room. When she finds out that an event will be a black-tie affair, for example, she won't suggest casual invitations that might cause embarrassment.

Mortfield charges between $700 and $1,000 for most affairs, depending on the quantity and design. She says some supplies come from the United States, where a wider selection gives clients more paper and graphic choice. Custom kippot can also be bought for $20 a dozen.

Shapiro's handmade invites cost an average of $5 per invitation, less with no RSVP card. She also designs baby cards, sign boards, book covers, sign-in guestbooks and picture collages.

Price structure is worth figuring out, Mortfield says. For invitation companies that work with printing presses (as opposed to hand-crafting), 25 invitations cost as much as 100 invitations because the bulk of expense is eaten up by the first 25 copies.

"Always order more than you need, it won't cost you much more," she says.

When shopping around, look for someone you can trust, says Shapiro.

"Ask a friend who's tried that company before how they liked the service. Reliability always helps."

Mortfield understands the importance of reputation. She deals with clients first at their bar mitzvahs, then later at their wedding and then at their son's brit milah.

"My clients know they can trust my judgement, which is very important in this business."

Shapiro stresses the importance of the consultation process, where ideas are polished and designs fine-tuned.

"No one knows 100 per cent for sure what they want. I try to make ideas into reality."

But give invitation makers time to be creative. Mortfield says she likes to be contacted six months before an event, although her turnaround time is three weeks. Shapiro echoes the same numbers, and adds clients should be armed with a vision during the first meeting.

Sometimes, a job well done means high expectations – a byproduct Mortfield will gladly embrace.

"For a wedding once, I made these gorgeous invitations with beautiful calligraphy on the envelope," she recalls. "Even the RSVPs were exquisite. Then I received a frantic call from my client and she says she's mad at me. I asked her why and she said her guests were expecting the party to live up to the invitations." She laughs. "That's not such a bad complaint."

Entertainer organizes everything to keep the party going

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rick Levine's Times Square entertainment Group with party guests at a recent Bar Mitzvah.

[Daniel Levine photo]

After 20 years, Rick Levine of Times Square Entertainment (905-881-6400) knows what makes a party great.

"If you play quiet music during the dinner hour, lively music during the dance party, and make sure the entertainers are ready when the party is ready to roll, you'll have a hit," he says.

Levine, who adds an array of interactive elements to the party ranging from lighting, dancers and party games to party favours and dance routines, says he is one of the few entertainers who offers both live and taped music.

"When we sing live to the backtracks, we appeal to people of all ages. The adults love our varied repertoire that includes Sinatra and old rock and roll, and the kids are enthralled because we are unique. They don't see something like that anywhere else."

It becomes the ultimate party, he says, because they alternate seamlessly between live and taped music.

> 'The kids are enthralled because we are unique!'

Rather than selling party favours, he says, he provides lists of favours that work with their interactive routines. "Without giving away any trade secrets, we ask our clients to get such items as hula hoops and Hawaiian leis. These giveaways become meaningful because they become part of the act.

"We refer clients to wholesalers and distributors who sell the items at a discounted price," he says.

Those in the midst of planning a party can visit Levine's twice annual party show (www.TorontoPartyGuide.com), which features party planning professionals.

"While there, they can speak to people who will help them make a fabulous simchah regardless of budget. The party business works on referrals, so visiting the show is a great way to meet the people to whom you have been referred," he says.

When choosing entertainment for your party, Levine suggests logging onto entertainers' Web sites. "These sites offer a lot of information and usually include samples of their music." His site is thericklevineband.com.

Levine says his company makes life a lot easier for hosts because he offers party planning services. "We organize the evening by creating an agenda and keeping the events flowing, and we are able to suggest party professionals.

"We also troubleshoot. Power failures can be a huge problem, so we make sure we get to the venue early in order to check out the power requirements. We suggest to musicians and photographers who should use what outlet in order to keep the power flowing."

Levine offers packages for any budget and suggests calling him up to three years in advance for a bar or bat mitzvah, and as soon as possible for a wedding.

Mandell 'redefines the art and science of interactive entertainment'

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

The Mandell Entertainment Group is moving in the direction of providing complete entertainment packages, instead of producing events in which MCs and disc jockeys are the focus.

"We're doing a lot more production in terms of staging, lighting and special effects," says Jared Florence, the president of Mandell Entertainment (416-923-7200).

The company was founded by Corey Mandell 12 years ago, and last September, Florence and Mandell joined forces when Florence's entertainment company and Mandell Entertainment merged. This dynamic duo has gone on to produce events that are on the cutting edge of party entertainment.

For one event, they recreated the atmosphere of the Moulin Rouge, the famous Paris nightclub.

Corey Mandell in action.

At a recent simchah, the ballroom of a synagogue was transformed into a garden,.with the dance floor becoming the swimming pool. "We were able to create the effect of being under the surface of the water," Florence says. "With the newest lights, you can create effects like this."

They've done video introductions to bar and bat mitzvahs, with the guest-of-honour smashing through the screen when the video ends. It's a dramatic effect that's created by showing the video inside a giant frame.

Mandell Entertainment has taken video games to a new level, projecting Xbox and Sony PlayStation onto a 12-foot by 12-foot screen. With up to eight participants playing at once, "it gives kids something to do at cocktail or dinner time, when adults want to enjoy a quieter time," Florence says.

Party giveaways include three-dimensional, digital motion folders. Two photographs, taken at a photo booth or by a roving photographer, are printed into a custom folder at the simchah. "When you move the folder back and forth," Florence says,"the image changes from the first picture to the second one."

Popular party novelty items on the non-digital spectrum include mesh trucker hats, which are all the rage these days. The wizards at Mandell Entertainment call them "graffiti trucker hats." The hats are printed with text of the guests' choice, and they get to take their hat home as a party souvenir.

Mandell Entertainment gives clients the option of booking live entertainment, including singers, dancers and a band.

Their high-energy dancers, who specialize in hip-hop and funky dance styles, are a huge hit at parties. The dancers are available for party introductions in which the guest-of-honour's presentation becomes part of a dance routine, and they can be booked for dance lessons before an event.

Disco divas, live female vocalists and a band of anywhere from six to 10 musicians round out Mandell Entertainment's roster of live entertainment.

Jared Florence: Complete customer satisfaction.

While the company brings increasing sophistication to the party-entertainment scene, their MCs, the party animators, and sharp disc jockeys, who can read the crowd's response to the music, are still an important part of the team at the events produced by Mandell Entertainment.

Mandell Entertainment promises its clients the ultimate in party planning.

"The company focuses on complete customer satisfaction," Florence says, "and is redefining the art and science of interactive entertainment."

When it comes to suits, these retailers treat boys like men

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Shopping for dress clothes for boys can be difficult, but there are a few places in the city that make it enjoyable, or at least bearable.

Le Club (416-488-7848) began as a menswear store, but it has recently made a name for itself in children's teens' fashions. Located on Eglinton Avenue near Avenue Road, Le Club bills itself as one-stop shopping for fathers and sons, says owner Nadia Serraf.

"We try to dress boys for the occasion, but also dress them with a bit of flair. We treat boys' clothes like men's clothes," she says.

Serraf, a professional image and wardrobe consultant, says the most popular colour for boys and menswear is "black, black and black."

And because boys "grow like weeds," she advises using a black bar mitzvah suit – Le Club's boys' suits are made from 100 per cent wool – for other occasions by dressing it up with colourful shirts and ties.

For suit styles, Serraf recommends a three-button jacket paired with a polo or dressy shirt in a colour such as burgundy or white.

For men, Serraf suggests co-ordinating the colour of belts and shoes for an elegant look. Le Club also sells shoes, ties and belts, and Serraf will put together a full outfit for customers.

Also uptown is Crawford Boys (416-782-8137), which specializes in suits for boys and teenagers who don't quite fit into adult sizes. "We're a grown-up store with kids' sizes," says owner Paul Spiar.

'Grown-up store with kids' sizes'

About 10 years ago, the family-run business realized there were no menswear stores that catered specifically to children and teenagers in need of dressy clothes. Thus a niche store was born.

Crawford Boys stocks suits, sports jackets, dressy jeans and slacks in sizes 4 to 20, and boasts the largest selection of husky sizes – for "stocky guys who need more room in the middle" – in the city.

Among the brands in stock are Nautica, Perry Ellis, Tommy Hilfiger and Point Zero.

Spiar says he tries to make suit shopping fun for boys. The store has a basketball hoop and a pinball machine, and sports memorabilia is tacked to the walls. He also keeps a basket with thousands of hockey cards for kids to look through, and even take a few.

Boys' fashions tend to fall on the conservative side, says Spiar. "Usually we have shades of blacks and navy, sometimes earthy tones for suits and sports jackets." Soft, silky textures are also popular, and the store sells a lot of dress crewneck shirts and dressy denim.

He recommends that suit shopping for growing boys be done no more than one to two months before an event, and that alterations be done three weeks before.

If junior has an unexpected growth spurt between the time the suit is bought and scheduled to be worn, Spiar will exchange it at no cost, provided no alterations have been made.

Mister Disc Jockey needs no introduction

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Ed McMurtry of Mister Disc Jockey (1-877-473-3800) has an exceptional reputation that is manifested formally through many party industry awards, and among clients by word of mouth. This is even more remarkable, considering how much competition is out there.

"When a client flies us to Hawaii to do a bar mitzvah," McMurtry observes, "it's more than a commission. It's an accolade."

The success of Mister Disc Jockey, operated by Edwin Allen Productions, is built on two factors. The first is the breath of fresh, creative air he brings to every party. The second is the human touch.

McMurtry strives not just to meet expectations, but to exceed them. "It's like an exam," he says. "Strive for 100 per cent and you'll probably do well, even though you don't hit 100. Aim no higher than a pass, and you'll probably fail."

McMurtry likes to liven up every party with a novel idea. At the recent launch of a drug research centre, the guests looked as if they'd be more at ease in lab coats than party hats, and it was his job to get them to lighten up.

So he got them to play "nuts and bolts." Each woman was given a nut, and each man a bolt, with different threading: metric, standard, whatever other types McMurtry could get hold of, and the guests had to match them, with door prizes for the first five matches. It worked, and "a good time was had by all," he says.

McMurtry tries to keep parties at a high energy level. This requires a virtually inexhaustible fund of ideas and enough rapport with host and guests to know which ideas will work.

He follows the maxim, "You have two ears and a mouth. Use them proportionately." In other words, make suggestions and ask questions, but above all, listen.

The human touch means making guests want to get involved and letting them do so at their own pace. McMurtry talks to people at their own level, to make them want to perform and imbue them with the confidence that they can do so. Even microphone-shy introverts take part.

It's a matter of not pushing, but enticing. The friendliest MC or DJ, spotlighted onstage speaking through a mike, can be intimidating. McMurtry introduces himself and his team, not in a public announcer's voice, but in an understated way that puts you at ease.

Even people who aren't shy and retiring are tired of entertainers who generate laughs by embarrassing the bar mitzvah boy's mom or dad. Being spotlighted can be embarrassing, even if the attention is complimentary (for example, at a party in your honour).

McMurtry does not want to heighten your embarrassment, but tries to help you overcome it. He respects your dignity and treats everyone like a mensch. This makes him and his team ideal for family events.

Edwin Allen Productions' staff have something for every party.

Here's one way to overcome shyness, that exemplifies what McMurtry calls his "extra one per cent" of thought and effort. The MC tosses inflatable mikes into the audience. Anyone who wants to perform grabs one. The others let them go by. The MC then invites everyone with a mike onstage. Those who change their mind unobtrusively drop their mikes without being singled out and the others go on up.

Inflatable mikes aren't new, but using them as a tool to put people at ease, is. No matter how wonderful the special effects, it's touches like this that make a party.

"Your child's smile," McMurtry assures you, "will last forever."

It's not the entertainers who are the stars at a simchah. Mister Disc Jockey builds the party around the real star, the child.

One problem with an all-ages event is that at certain times, kids aren't part of the party. At a bar mitzvah, kids are left out during the cocktail hour. And after they eat at warp speed, it cramps their style to have to sit still and wait for their elders to finish eating.

One of McMurtry's solutions is a chill room with old furniture in funky colours, where teens can have their own non-alcoholic cocktail area. Contests can be held there to keep kids busy while the adults finish dinner – say, Trivial Pursuit with the bar mitzvah boy as theme.

McMurtry stresses that the room would be open during cocktails or the later part of dinner – but not during the dancing, when everyone should be part of the main scene. The idea is not to have two parties, but one party where everyone has fun.

In addition to Mister Disc Jockey, Edwin Allen Productions offers Synergy, a themed, choreographed dance group, and the Loud Neighbours, five live DJs who can sing with a live band. Edwin Allen Productions' 35 professional employees have something for anyone's party.

Save stress and time with one-stop shopping

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Novelties and favours contribute a lot to a party's success, so pick your items with care. And if you can, choose a supplier who offers them all under one roof. Making just one trip will save you stress and time.

Of course, there may be exceptional items you can find only at a specialty store. Even so, one-stop shopping should serve most of your party needs. Before you decide on this, check out what's available.

Dan Jankelow and Saul Sacks of Incredible Novelties Inc. (905-881-9900, Web site www.incrediblenovelties.com) have plenty of experience in helping to make parties work well. Here are some of their tips on how to choose the people who supply your party favours.

Personal service is something you've got to have: it's the way to make a party unique. Jankelow and Sacks take it seriously, working one-on-one with you to customize your novelty package.

Good party professionals have front-line experience. Both Jankelow and Sacks were DJs for 10 years, handing out prizes, seeing what guests get a kick out of, whether they're kids or adults. And both partners still work as DJs, keeping their hands in.

Visit the supplier's store – both to see what's in stock and to get an idea of the quality of service. When you see what's on the shelves, you may realize that the world of novelties is bigger than you thought. Such a visit should be fun, too.

Doubtless, you've seen lots of LED and glow items, sports gear, hats, funny glasses and other cute novelties. There are lots of products, though, that aren't in the stores yet, at least not in Canada. Jankelow and Sacks keep themselves up to date on these.

This is an ongoing job in its own right: there's no end to designer creativity in the field. What's available in any one of the categories of glow items, glassware and headgear would fill a separate catalogue.

A supplier who is truly one-stop, is all-encompassing. You may want to hire a caterer for many events, but having a one-stop supplier who can provide food for a kids' party can save you some running around.

Make sure your supplier is ready to do the searches you need, so you get what you want. "If the product is out there," Jankelow says confidently, "we'll find it. If you can't find the item you're looking for, just let us know and we will get it for you."

> Personal service is something you've got to have: it's the way to make a party unique.

Choose all-round professionals who aren't too specialized. Jankelow does more corporate work, while Sacks does more simchahs, but neither of them does exclusively one or the other, so each can back the other up.

You'll want to spend less money for more value, so look for competitive prices, as well as amenities like free consultation and delivery. In fact, Jankelow and Sacks refer to their business as "Canada's first novelty consulting company." For them, service is as important as product.

Finally, your suppliers should know how to calculate how many prizes you need. You don't want too few, so no guest feels left out. Nor do you want too many, since nothing should go to waste. This means choosing just the right number of favours which everyone likes, so no one wants to throw his or hers away.

Simchah scrapbooks create a `meaningful legacy'

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

For people looking for an extra memento from their simchah, scrapbooking is an excellent way to preserve memories for the future. Wendy Preskow (905-764-1293) runs a scrapbooking business called Creative Memories, and she holds classes to teach people how to put together beautiful scrapbooks that can last a lifetime.

"Scrapbooks can become a meaningful family tradition and legacy," Preskow says.

She often sees parents making scrapbooks for their children's bar or bat mitzvahs. The books can then be used as signing books at the party instead of, or in addition to, a signing board.

However, making a memory album can take up to a year, so Preskow urges would-be scrapbookers to start early.

For her beginner's classes, Preskow asks customers to bring eight to 10 photos related to the subject that they would like to include. She then guides them through the first steps of creating a scrapbook, such as creating a layout and cropping photos and mounting them onto the album. Choose photos with people in them, she says, because they are easier to crop and mount.

Preskow also provides beginners with all the necessary supplies, including fancy pens, decorative pieces and the first few pages of the album.

While additional pages cost extra, she says that most people end up purchasing an album from her and then decorate it at home. The albums have warranties guaranteed for the lifetime of the owner.

The classes are run out of Preskow's Thornhill home, but she also goes to scrapbookers' homes.

If a scrapbooker brings in a group of 15 or more, the class fee of $15 is waived for the organizer.

Décor specialists turn imagination into reality

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Your party décor should add to the life of your party, while beautifying its location.

Designs by Karen Baker (905-886-8100) offers full-service event co-ordinating. Owner and designer Karen Baker studied Ikebana, the Japanese art of flower arrangement, at the Japanese Cultural Centre. She brings her original ideas to her work, creating fresh and exciting looks with exotic accents.

She is heavily influenced by her travels to exotic locales, where she says she gets "different ideas, [sees] different cultures and colour design."

She says Costa Rica, Australia and Israel are all places that may be subtly represented in her creations.

Baker makes use of the beautiful bounty of new flowers available from all over the world in her bouquets and centrepieces. The Hocus Pocus rose – burgundy with a yellow stripe – is from Israel, while other new rose colours are brought in regularly from Ecuador.

Lately, she has incorporated henna parties into her repertoire. In them, the backdrop and chair have a Middle Eastern look and are surrounded by palm trees draped in the rich colours of North Africa.

"I listen to the client and try to visually give them how they imagine their party," Baker says.

Floral decor trend is definitely 'elegant'

Also known for making exquisite yet functional mechitzahs, Baker can decorate any simchah, from the traditional, classic wedding to something new, creative and exciting.

She says the latest look uses lots of beads and crystals, including crystal candelabras with hanging beads and bridal bouquets with beads wrapped around them.

Baker says the trend is definitely "more elegant. People want a finished look. As long as you balance your colours, that's half the challenge right there, trying to use the room to its fullest potential."

Floral designs on this page by An Affair to Remember

Renee Birnbaum is the owner, designer and co-ordinator of An Affair to Remember (905-881-6686), which pulls together all the minute details of a party's décor – from chair covers to backdrop – so clients don't have to worry.

"We're a full décor company," says Birnbaum, who puts a premium on being friendly.

"I've been told that I'm easy to get along with and I always do what I say I'm going to do and more."

Known for her elaborate centrepieces, Birnbaum notes that bar and bat mitzvah themes are getting back to floral designs.

"Adults appreciate them, they last longer, and for the kids they can add in themes. Flowers add dimension, colour and elegance that people want in their parties."

Birnbaum says she has used one very versatile prop many different ways. Dragonwood trees that can hold candles have been adapted to be used as centrepieces at weddings and for Tu B'Shvat, as well as in Survivor and jungle themes.

She says clients are usually awestruck when they first see what she does with a room. "People find it's even above and beyond what they thought."

An Affair To Remember is involved in a lot of charity work. One event they put on for Mazon Canada combined the theme of food and produce with an Israeli atmosphere in the form of an open air market.

The party featured awnings that covered tables with abundant fruits and vegetables, which were all donated and which in turn were later given to local shelters.

Says Birnbaum, "I try to work within any budget, which is very important. Only our look is expensive."

PARTY PLANNER

DJs are performers at heart

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Personality goes a long way, even in the party business. DJs should be loaded with both experience and appealing attitudes, say two entertainment companies.

Clients looking for DJs will likely find the same dancers and lighting and music options at every business, says Noah Cappe, president of Superfly Entertainment (416-652-2232). But the real selling point, he believes, is the DJ's personality and his on-the-job judgement.

"Our DJs are passionate about their work, and this isn't just a cool job for them," he says. "They're performers at heart. Because half of them are actors, and can flip their personality on the fly, you won't see the same show twice from Superfly."

Noah Cappe clowns around.

Eric Bouaziz, president of Starr Productions (905-707-8211), agrees.

"Each DJ of ours has a different flavour, a different style."

For example, Bouaziz, who has a decade of DJing under his belt, is the slick lady's man, while another Starr employee might act goofy for his client's needs.

Noah Cappe

No matter the option, the partymaster needs to mingle with the crowd and get guests moving, Bouaziz says. Mom and Dad will get on stage to impersonate Grease leads, or the dance hit Hey Baby will animate Bubbie and Zaide.

"In the end, though, we let the kids know it's their party," he says.

Cappe's crew are also tireless entertainers.

"We don't slow down, even in the last half hour," Cappe says.

As he puts it: "Guests won't remember the flowers or the balloons at an event – they remember how great the party vibe was." He then adds: "But only if the DJ was amazing."

While Cappe claims many DJ companies offer the same service, he highlights his recent innovations. The Interactive Video Package screens a pre-taped video of the bar mitzvah boy answering personal questions. Kids answer questions such as, "What is my favourite food?" and the first to guess the right response wins a prize. The package, which requires a projector and screen, is ideal for "involving the kids when they've finished dinner before the adults."

Novelties are in Bouaziz's loot bag. Airbrushed baseball caps, custom dog tags and personalized rice grains spice up weddings and bar or bat mitzvahs.

Cappe offers some funkier options for sassy party planners. A DJ spinning old-school turntables is available, a high-energy experience for guests keen on "scratching." In the same vein, Bouaziz offers a DJ-beatboxer, who can simulate hip-hop beats just with his mouth.

Exclusive to Superfly, says Cappe, is the rent-a-guest idea, where the client secretly hires an actor to attend the function and pretend to be some oddball character. A hockey goalie may suddenly challenge the kids to a shootout, which happened once, Cappe recalls.

"Our rent-a-guests are custom, so the client can choose this actor to be anything at all," he adds.

Bonus frills aside, a basic DJ package hovers in the $1500 range at Superfly. The video add-on, for instance, is an additional $950.

As many DJs attest, you pay for what you get in this business.

"If you get someone cheap, you'll see the difference," warns Bouaziz. At Starr, the minimum price is around $1000 but top-quality DJs and dancers (some from the National Ballet of Canada) can bring the total up to $5000.

Clients shouldn't worry too much about buying deluxe packages, says Cappe.

"If you hire a good DJ who knows his music, you won't need any extras."

Cappe stresses the importance of honesty.

"[DJs] should work within their client's budget and not offer something that they don't need. If my client will survive with four lights, I won't try to sell him eight lights."

On DJ-client connection, Bouaziz says, "DJs should work with the party rather than for the party."

That raises an interesting trend: DJs can now be part event-co-ordinator. Bouaziz and Cappe both mention how their employees can smooth out party wrinkles when "one parent is going crazy over the smallest details," as Cappe puts it. Advice on videos, florists and catering can ease the burden of anxious planning.

Before the event is even rocking, Cappe suggests foresight.

"You can never book early enough. I have 25 bookings for 2005 already. The longer you wait, the less selection you'll have."

And no one wants to be a test drive for the new 18-year-old DJ.

Give yourself the time to chose the perfect gift

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Choosing a gift is important. Forever after, you and the gift could be linked in the mind of the receiver, so give yourself time and choose with care.

What to give?

Here are some ideas from Steven Petroff of A Show of Hands-Petroff Gallery (416-782-1696, 1-877-542-360, www.ashowofhands.com) and Michel Korman of Laurentian Jewellery (416-782-3588).

A uniquely crafted challah board from the Petroff Gallery

A uniquely crafted work of art is an excellent gift for a special friend or relative. It says that the person you're giving it to has a unique, special place in your life.

In choosing such a gift, go to stores where you can browse and not be hurried. At Petroff Gallery, you're encouraged to take your time, as you would be in a good bookstore.

"We're not here to make a sale, but a client," Petroff explains.

Petroff Gallery is well-lit, with high ceilings and wide windows. You can stroll among the craft items and enjoy the array of shapes, textures and colours as you make your choice.

You can also bring family, as this gallery is for all ages. There are even things you can reach out and touch.

Petroff Gallery is a craft showcase for one-of-a-kind jewellery, glassware, ceramics, textiles and other items in a variety of media. The textile selection covers everything from tapestries to quilts and scarves.

Among the gifts are kaleidoscopes. These simple objects can offer hours of contemplation, looking at changing patterns as unique as snowflakes.

Of Petroff Gallery's 400 artists, about 80 per cent are Canadian and 10 per cent are Israeli. The gallery is unusual in not demanding that artists show exclusively with it, provided that other galleries showcasing an artist's work aren't close enough to be competitors. However, many artists find it easier to work with one gallery, Petroff says.

The gallery's large Judaica selection, represented in all media, includes challah boards and covers, kiddush cups and candlesticks. This close to Chanukah, you may be thinking of chanukiyot, and Petroff has plenty, along with a wide range of bar and bat mitzvah gifts.

There are also lots of mezuzot, including "kosher" klafs (scrolls) separate from mezuzah containers themselves. Also, Petroff carries wearable mezuzah necklaces.

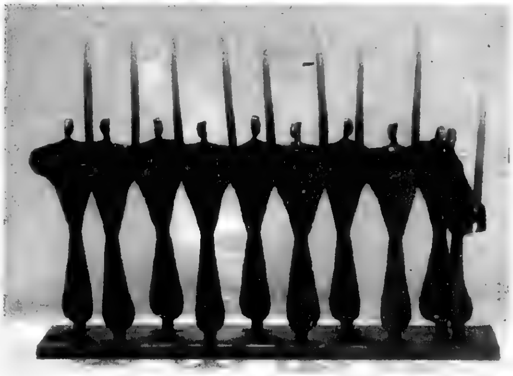
Jewelry and precious stones have been given as gifts from time immemorial. To the beauty and the economic value of precious metal or stone, Laurentian Jewellery's gifts add the artistic value of crafted work.

As one of the hardest substances in the world, a diamond is forever, or close to it, and precious metals, malleable as they are, are durable, so it makes sense that diamonds and jewels would symbolize feelings of lasting value.

Yet Korman believes that much of the value we attach to jewelry is created by social conditioning. We value it because we've been told time and again that we should.

Conditioning or not, the feelings are very strong, and cost and rarity mean that a ring or bracelet is not chosen lightly. The recipient knows this, and sees the choice of gift not as an impulse, but the result of careful thought and durable feelings. Jewelry is also personal in a very physical way, Korman points out: you wear it next your skin.

Durable as jewelry is, it is subject to fashions and trends. Korman cites wristwatches as an example: good ones used to be costly, given only to those in their teens or older. Inexpensive, reliable quartz movements have changed that, and watches are now seen as suitable gifts for people of all ages.



A simchah menorah by artist Boris Kramer from Petroff Gallery

Korman has noticed that one item that's popular with men and women, both young and old, is the stainless steel nomination bracelet. Each link is individual, and can be removed or added and set with a stone, an initial or whatever you like. You can also add to the bracelet according to your means and taste.

A diamond, says Korman, is always a good idea, but there are lots of other kinds of stones, and not just precious ones.

Yet sometimes, he says, the best gift is a simple band of gold.

Entertainment from clowns to food

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

In the entertainment field, there's no end to new ideas.

There's a lot of competition these days, and if you're going to be in the field, you need to think big. This is the view of Michele Revivo, owner and operator of Party Props (905-417-3280). Her motto is: "Go big, or go home."

It's no longer enough to stay one step ahead of the competition. Entertainers, says Revivo, need "to create entirely new directions, the barriers to which are extremely high."

Only if an idea is a challenge for the entertainer to create will it be a challenge for competitors to match.

Besides having their own ideas, the entertainers you choose should listen to your ideas.

"Most of the time," says Revivo, "it's clients that come up with great ideas."

Revivo began her career as an esthetician. But as she talked to her clients, she realized how high the demand for creative fun was. She set out to meet the demand, becoming a one-stop shop for everything that helps make parties a success.

FLAVOUR STATION

Popcorn treats from Party Props

Today her business carries such items as airbrush tattoos, airbrushed and stencilled T-shirts, novelties from glow necklaces to body strobe lights, pop tops (pop can tabs made into personalized jewelry), makeup, costumes, sparkle dust, body glitter and hair dyeing, a wide range of other accessories and food.

Party Props recently made an exclusive deal with Yogen Früz to give individual and corporate hosts the chance to serve frozen yogurt and related novelties at their parties.

The two companies created a portable kiosk to serve the product. As part of the kiosk or a separate item, there's a machine for fruity ice and slushies. (Adults can add alcohol.)

Party Props has also signed another exclusive deal with BRANDFUSION to create a Kernels Popcorn flavour station. You can rent a stand-alone machine for plain popcorn or Kernels can set up at your party in a way that's like their retail outlets, with popcorn for each guest and a variety of seasonings.

Farberman enjoys performing and he likes it even more when he gets the whole audience to participate, parents as well as kids.

"I'm getting paid to have fun," he laughs. "And every event is a different experience. I'm always writing new material."

He began performing in 1980 in the greater Toronto area. Since then, he has entertained thousands at festivals, fairs, trade shows and private parties in Canada and around the world. For seven years, he's had his own cable TV show.

His clients have included Planet Hollywood, American Express and Yamaha. He enjoys everything from kids' parties to corporate events with thousands of guests, and his love of performing and pleasing his clients makes him popular with families as much as companies.

Wedding gowns are worth studying before setting out to shop

Before you buy your wedding gown, you need to conduct a little research so that you will know which styles, fabrics and prices suit your ceremony, wedding reception and budget.

Avoid being overwhelmed by all the stunning gowns you will see in the bridal shop. Instead, take some time to prepare yourself. The stores are filled with national bridal magazines and many of them are accessible online. Get a feel for what's on the market or what can be made-to-order by a dressmaker.

Another good place to do research is in your own cupboard. Take note of your clothes and notice the necklines, sleeves, fabrics and other features that you tend to wear. It is important to seek out the styles that suit you. Also note the clothes that you rarely wear because they aren't right for you. Avoid these styles when you shop for a gown.

Also before you set out, call a few bridal salons and set up appointments so that you will receive immediate assistance. It's almost an in-house education because you will discover what styles take time to make, the extra charges for alterations and all the time it takes to go for fittings and find matching accessories.

Leave yourself as much time as possible before the wedding because the dress you wear may take time to import or sew or alter. For ready-to-wear, the gown will be ordered from the manufacturer's size chart according to your measurements, regardless of the size of the sample.

When you are ready to shop, it's a good idea to take a sincere friend or relative with you before you make your final choice. But don't rely on too many conflicting opinions. Remember, it's your wedding and you're the one walking down the aisle in that gown.

PARTY PLANNER

Alternative ketubot online

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

In 1969, the typical ketubah was a plain, printed form that was filled out by a rabbi and then stashed into a drawer by the newlywed couple.

The ketubah, the Jewish marriage contract, originates from the fifth century BCE, shortly after the return from the Babylonian exile. Over the centuries, ketubot were beautifully adorned with designs reflecting the regions in which they were made. One can tell whether a historic ketubah is from Rome, other regions of Italy, Afghanistan, Persia or Gibraltar.

The practice of decorating the ketubah died out early in the last century. It was revived by an article by artist David Moss about ketubah-making that was published in the early 1970s in the First Jewish Catalog, a Whole Earth-type catalogue of everything Jewish.

"There has been a transformation in the function of the ketubah in the couple's marriage preparation, in the ceremony itself, and in the introduction of a work of Jewish art in tens of thousands of homes," Moss wrote. "In the process, a new profession – ketubah-makers or ketubah artists – with hundreds of members has been created."

One of the ketubot makers to come out of the revival is Michael Shapiro.

After finishing his MBA and working briefly in marketing, Shapiro spent some time in Israel, where he studied at Pardes Institute in Jerusalem.

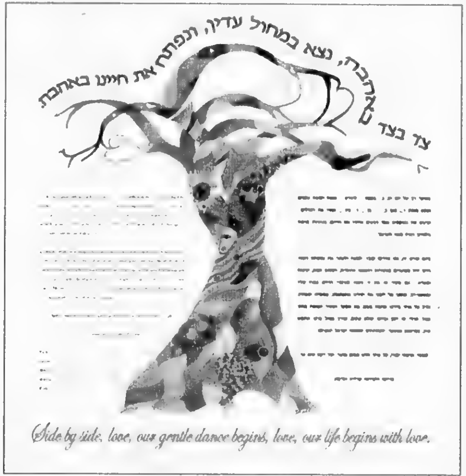
"While I was there, I met my first ketubah artist, and I came up with a business idea that would include Judaism and art, two interests of mine," he says.

Shapiro returned to Toronto, planning to open a Judaica gallery. At the same time, the Internet was burgeoning as a new market.

In 1996, Shapiro launched the Web site Ketubah Ketubah (www.ketubah.com, 416-963-9191).

At that time, artists were making printed ketubot that were more accessible to the public than original works of art, Shapiro says.

"They're less expensive, but with high-quality archival ink and archival paper."



צד בצד באהבה, נצא במחול עדין, תפתח את חיינו באהבה
Side by side, love, our gentle dance begins, love, our life begins with love.

Prices for Ketubah Ketubah's printed ketubot start at $100 and go up to $900 for hand-painted reproductions. The site features a selection of some 300 stunning designs done by more than 40 artists.

"The ketubah is one of the most meaningful and less expensive aspects of the average wedding," Shapiro says.

He says a factor in the revival of the decorative ketubah was the creation of an alternative to the traditional text, in which the groom pledges to care for his bride and promises a sum of money to her in case of divorce or his death. In its time, an era in which women didn't own property, the text was revolutionary in the protection it offered to women.

Ketubah Ketubah offers a choice of texts from all denominations, and are all described on the site. An anniversary text, commemorating the years a couple have spent together as husband and wife and looking ahead to their continued happiness together, is also available.

Ketubah Ketubah recommends that couples consult with their rabbi after they select their text, as rabbis often prefer or require a certain type of ketubah and many of them use only the type of the movement they represent.

Most of Shapiro's clients order through the Web site, but they can also telephone Ketubah Ketubah to ask questions, discuss their requirements or make an appointment to look through samples, Shapiro says.

"We offer personable customer service. We are a Web site with really friendly people behind it."

Ketubah Ketubah's site includes two pages of testimonials from satisfied customers.

One couple, Rick and Angie of Schaumburg, Ill., wrote: "We just wanted to take some time to thank you for all your help in getting our ketubah to us on time. It is beautiful. We couldn't have hoped for anything better. Everyone we have showed it to just loves it. We can't wait to sign it. Thanks so much for putting up with all our questions. You did a great job." Ketubah Ketubah has sold thousands of ketubot, mainly in North America, but also in South America, Europe, Israel, India, Hong Kong, Singapore, Australia and one in China.

"We're the ketubah specialists," Shapiro says. "People can come to us and then there's one less thing to do in planning a wedding.

For a stress-free party, hire a planner

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

The stress of organizing a party has several causes. One is obviously the cost, while another is the emotional charge attached to a milestone event such as a wedding. Yet another is a result of the need to co-ordinate all the facets of your party while working to a deadline.

Together, these factors can put a heavy load on your mind.

You hire a planner to make your party "stress-free and perfect." This is how Lynn Cohen of Lynn Cohen Wedding and Party Planners (905-889-1007), puts it, and Judy Stein of Judy Stein Consulting (905-764-2728) describes her work in a similar way.

Lynn Cohen

Cohen's mother was also a party planner. Since her mother's time, Cohen says, parties have grown bigger and more expensive, as well as more elaborate and demanding. Today, she says, "a planner is a necessity, not a luxury. There are too many facets to co-ordinate."

But how do you choose the planner who is best for you?

"There's no such thing as one size fits all," Stein says. A planner who's ideal for one client might not be for another.

"Find out immediately what her service offers – whether she is always on call and will meet with you again after the initial appointment," Cohen advises, noting that if a planner's job is to relieve stress, she has to be there when you need her.

Financial and organizational issues should be addressed early on in the planning process, Cohen says. As soon as a day is selected, she meets with you and helps design the event around your budget.

"A planner does as little or as much as the client wants," Stein says.

She says her main role is to keep you organized. She can do most of the work herself, or you can do most of it and she will simply be available for consultations.

Cohen and Stein both say that a vital part of their job is helping clients select the professionals, such as the florists and musicians, who will work at a party. Besides knowing what's available, this requires good rapport with suppliers and professionals, so that you get the most for your budget.

Most clients, in Stein's experience, want to do some things themselves while delegating others, and they may want to work alongside the planner on yet other parts of a simchah. In any case, your planner needs input from you as to what you want to do yourself and what you intend to leave to her.

However, Stein points out, the ultimate responsibility always rests with you. You're the one who decides who is hired, because you sign the contracts.

Stein says her experience is a key asset to her clients, while another is her ability to have a calming effect on a simchah.

"Humour plays a role in lightening things up from time to time," she says.

Stein says she has been a consultant long enough to know how to set priorities and deal with the unexpected. What may seem like a crisis to you is likely to be something she has dealt with many times before.

Cohen also places a high value on her experience. She says that planning and co-ordinating two wedding and bar/bat mitzvah shows a year for the past 11 years for Jewish clients has kept her "in tune with everyone's needs."

She adds that party planners network among themselves, so if she learns of a good new linen supplier, for example, she will tell her colleagues. Likewise, if she sees someone else doing something she likes, she will add it to her professional repertoire.

Judy Stein [Signature photography]

It also helps, says Stein, if your planner has an innovative streak and can come up with fun ideas on her own. And a planner should know how to keep kids happy, she adds.

Stein says she wants to help her clients enjoy the planning process as well as the party itself. To this end, she has to enjoy working with you. Fortunately, she says, most people are likeable, and she says she enjoys bringing out the best in them.

Stein's says he first meeting with a client is just to ask questions and establish a rapport.

For the client, the process may feel scary, like jumping into a swimming pool, but don't worry, says Stein, "the water's fine."

Indeed, she says she has seen many business relationships endure as friendships long after a simchah has ended.

Student party planner has found her calling online

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Tammy Benlolo started a Web directory for local simchah planners that has, in less than a year, attracted dozens of advertisers and thousands of users a month.

Benlolo, who's 23 and in her third year at York University, launched mysimcha.ca (www.mysimcha.ca, 416-527-5551) last January to help simchah planners to find the services and products they need.

Benlolo discovered there's a large demand for information about party services and products. Currently, about 2,000 users browse through mysimcha.ca each month.

"A lot of individuals who are planning a celebration don't know who to call," Benlolo says.

Mysimcha.ca members offer products and services such as bridal wear, flowers, gift baskets, hair and spa services, honeymoon bookings, invitations, jewellery, limousines, photography, rentals and accessories, videos and venues. The names, addresses and telephone numbers of local Conservative, Orthodox and Reform synagogues, along with catering information, are also included. Members pay a yearly fee of $180 for a display ad on the site.

The site gives users the opportunity to contact members by telephone, by e-mail and to access member Web sites, Benlolo says. She's kept the format of mysimcha.ca simple and easy to navigate, something site members and users appreciate, she says.

A new article about a member business is featured on the site's home page every two weeks, along with a tip-of-the-week provided by a mysimcha.ca member.

Some businesses contacted by mysimcha.ca were initially a little wary of being on a Web site, Benlolo says, as hers was the only party Web site in Toronto at the time that catered to the Jewish community.

But businesses went ahead and joined mysimcha.ca because they knew they had to keep up with technology and get online. And they've been amazed by the response to their ads.

Mysimcha.ca also includes a section for community listings

"I know members have received quite a bit of business," Benlolo says.

Mysimcha.ca is ranked no. 1 for simchah planning on such search engines as Ask Jeeves, America Online, Google and Yahoo, which means that anyone who searches on those engines for anything related to simchah planning in Toronto will find mysimcha.ca.

Mysimcha.ca also includes a section for community listings. Benlolo, who is going to be a leader for a Birthright Israel trip this December and next year, has a long history of involvement in the Jewish community.

"That's why I wanted to do the Web site," she says.

Last September, mysimcha.ca launched the first of its quarterly presentations on various aspects of simchah planning with the topic of how to choose a caterer. The panel included representatives from local caterers Tri Elm Catering, Opulence Catering and Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers. The event was such a success that people started to ask about the next one right afterward, Benlolo says.

Her inspiration for mysimcha.ca comes from being a teenage party planner. She says she organized a few parties when she was 17 and enjoyed it, and "realized a couple of years ago that there wasn't a Web site that offered this service."

It's a juggling act for Benlolo to work on mysimcha.ca – she has a sales staff of 20 – while majoring in English at university.

"I'm finding they're both my priorities," she says. "One is getting an education, and that's very important, and the second is my future."

She adds that she's still young and should be taking out more time for recreation, but that her work at mysimcha.ca is her passion.

"I found myself early," she says.

This year, anything goes in womenswear

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The trend in this season's clothing for women is that there is no trend, says Ginette Beauchamp, owner of Quasar Mode (416-964-1214), a women's clothing store at 1240 Bay St.

"This year, anything goes. Most designers realize that women have minds of their own, and they wear what enhances their bodies and personalities. Clothing should make women look good and feel confident," she says.

Beauchamp, who has run her store at the same location for 25 years, carries clothing from France and jewelry from Israel designed by Ayalla Bar.

"We emphasize casual chic, and we try to bring in original collections that enhance a woman's uniqueness," Beauchamp says.

Quasar Mode's clothing is size-friendly and comes in sizes 6 to 16.

"One designer, Chacoc, is known for his softly structured clothes in bold colours and flowing fabrics. He designs his pieces with elasticized waists in order to maximize comfort," Beauchamp says.

His colours are meant to be a contrast to the dark, grey colours of the city, she says.

"His prints are mood-enhancing and contribute to a feeling of well-being. From season to season, he emphasizes magenta, reds, fuchsia, and prints in reds, pinks and oranges. When these prints are created artistically the result is outstanding," Beauchamp says.

"We do sell lots of black suits and dresses, but when we display the colourful pieces in our windows, we wake up the window shoppers. Chacoc's originality makes his line of clothing never in fashion, but always in fashion."

When buying for her store, Beauchamp looks for clothing that is useful and versatile. "Women want to be able to wear their clothes to work, change their shoes and jewelry and then go out for the evening.

"It costs too much money to buy one outfit for one occasion. Women today want to dress up in a more casual way.

"Take a pair of black pants or skirt, top it with a jersey top or a sweater accented with leather or ribbons, and then add a pair of high heel boots, and you can go from the office to dinner."

Beauchamp also carries two collections that are machine washable and that pack up easily for travel. "Polyester has been redone, so it's comfortable and great looking. Women want clothes to work for them, and some of the manmade fabrics do just that."

One black pantsuit has a bolero jacket that is tied at the front, and has a soft lapel that drapes at the neck

"The jacket can be worn with a shirt during the day, and then alone for the evening. Clothes that can be transformed are a traveller's treat," she says.

Party venues offer one-stop convenience

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Between the chairs, food and music, simply getting everything to your party venue in one piece may be a challenge.

That's why an increasing number of venues are offering one-stop-shopping services.

"We're trying to combine all of our clients' wants and needs under one roof," says Sam D'Uva of the Eglinton Grand.

D'Uva says the facility is affiliated with kosher caterers, and it also provides clients with tables, chairs and linens while offering such amenities as state-of-the-art lighting and sound.

The entrance to the Eglinton Grand

"We're trying to give our clients the finest [services] for the most reasonable price," D'Uva says.

Sharon MacLeod of the Boulevard Club offers hosts some valuable tips on searching for a venue that suits your tastes.

"Make sure the capacity is adequate for your event," says MacLeod, noting that the Boulevard Club can accommodate up to 250 people for a sit-down affair.

MacLeod said booking inquiries are growing by the day and she advises people to secure a venue at least a year before their big event.

"I have people inquiring into 2005," she says.

While the services offered by a venue are important, its appearance and overall ambience are also key.

D'Uva notes that the Eglinton Grand was once the lavish Eglinton Theatre, a movie house built in the 1930s that has been renovated with design characteristics tailored to parties, such as new acoustic-sensitive ceilings.

The Boulevard Club is located on Toronto's lakeshore, providing what MacLeod describes as a "cottage" feel.

"You don't feel like you're in Toronto. You feel like you're at a lake, up north perhaps."

MacLeod said the club has a back lawn area by the lake that is popular for outdoor parties.

D'Uva says it's important when you're shopping around to be vigilant about pricing.

"The one thing you've got to be careful of is the extras," he says.

"We're going to tell you up front exactly what the price is for everything."

Both facilities are affiliated with suppliers of party necessities, from bands to wedding cakes, and they're happy to recommend them to clients. But D'Uva and MacLeod note clients have the freedom to choose unaffiliated suppliers.

Registries: Convenience in a wish list

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

People join gift registries to avoid getting duplicates of the same item, like five toaster ovens or three woks, or ending up with presents they don't need.

But registries have other advantages, too. A gift registry eliminates family and friends' uncertainty when they're shopping. They won't be asking themselves questions such as which shade of blue matches the bride's bathroom when they're looking at towels.

Even for a small wedding or a housewarming, guests will appreciate the convenience of a gift registry.

Davids Fine Linens carries an array of distinctive bedding.

In addition to linen, Deblins also carries unique Israeli pottery.

Couples holding housewarmings may have well-established households, but they have as good a reason to register as those who have nothing because there's even a greater chance that they'll receive items they don't need.

A gift registry works like this: the store records the items that are selected by the bride, including colours and other specifics. Family and friends get a wish list at the store, which they carry with them while they browse. To avoid duplication, the store keeps track of all the purchases made, and then provides a record of the gifts, simplifying the task of sending thank-you notes.

That describes the gift-registry service at Deblins Linens (www.deblins.com), with one difference. The store's three locations, in Vaughan (905-264-0975), Toronto (416-782-2910) and Mississauga (905-820-1509), are interconnected, owner Ellis Chitiz says. If a purchase is made at one of the Deblins' locations, it's automatically recorded at the other two.

Deblins features brand-name and designer bedding as well as towels and table linens at a 20 to 30 per cent discount. Experienced sales associates are on hand to help the bride select items. They should be in a wide range of prices so guests can find gifts that are within their budgets.

Chitiz suggests registering at Deblins no more than three months before a special event because some lines, other than certain imports and basics such as damask tablecloths and solid-colour towels, have a short life in the store.

The majority of the lines in Deblins are dropped within two years, he says, unless they are strong sellers throughout North America. If the bride registers three months in advance, her guests should have no trouble finding the lines they're looking for on the shelves of one of the store's locations.

Deblins provides cards that the bride can distribute to her guests to spread the word that she is registered at the store. Both the bride's mother and her financé's mother should understand how the registry works as they'll likely receive many requests for the information. And it's perfectly acceptable for registry information to be included on shower invitations.

Chitiz says customers can shop by telephone – a sales associate can bring up the wish list – but he recommends going into one of the Deblins locations.

"People are more productive if they do it themselves," Chitiz says. "If they have the time, it's always better to shop in person."

The convenience of registries

Although it's preferable to shop in person, that may be impossible for out-of-towners. Some gift registries include delivery (sometimes free), which means the gift will be delivered whether or not they can make it to the celebration.

Davids Fine Linens (416-590-7311, www.davidsfinelinens.com) has a toll-free telephone number (1-877-591-1115) for the convenience of out-of-town guests and the store delivers most gifts free of charge.

Located in charming Bayview Village, Davids Fine Linens carries an array of distinctive bedding, towels and table linens.

When a bride registers at Davids, an interior designer – there are two on staff – helps her to select items she would like to receive and suggests designs or colours she might not have considered.

David Saini, the owner of Davids Fine Linens, recommends joining his gift registry at least a month before the special event.

His gift-registry service includes cards that the bride can distribute to alert friends and family of the registry. Besides telling her mother and future mother-in-law that she's registered at Davids, and getting the information printed on her shower invitations, she should keep the cards in her purse or wallet or near the telephone, so they'll be handy when she needs one.

Saini says gift registries ensure that customers get merchandise they need.

"Otherwise they will get stuff they already have, gifts that will be dust collectors," he says.

Registering at places like Davids and Deblins eliminates gift-buying uncertainty.

One-stop gown shopping at Ritché's

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Ritché's carries well made gowns.

Ritché's Couture offers the bride-to-be one-stop shopping, with a selection of 1,000 lovely gowns in a wide range of prices and all the accessories she needs.

The shop's bridal gowns range in price from $800 to $4,000, with good variety in all price points, says Vivian Prussky, who runs Ritché's (416-789-4378, www.ritchebridal.com) along with her husband, Arthur. Prussky's father, Jack Ritch, opened the business in 1952.

Ritché's carries well-made bridal gowns with stunning beadwork in the lower price end, Prussky says, and recently she's added a few new styles in the $2,000 range. In the higher end, the $3,000 to $4,000 range, Ritché's features various designer lines, including one by Californian Amy Michelson, who is known for creating evening wear for Hollywood stars.

Michelson's elegant silk bridal gowns, in flattering bias cuts, are available in Canada exclusively at Ritché's.

When a bride comes into Ritché's for her first appointment, Prussky says, she first discusses gown styles with one of the store's consultants, who helps her try on dresses until she's found the one the perfect one.

"The consultants here know the stock better than they know their own closets," she says.

If a bride has a certain type of dress in mind, the consultant will find it.

Prussky adds that most brides order their gowns on their first or second visit to the store.

After the gown is delivered, it's time for the bride's first fitting. She'll need accessories, a veil, a head piece, shoes and undergarments – all available from Ritché's.

"We have everything they need," Prussky says, adding that that includes jewelry.

She suggests brides look for their gowns eight to 12 months before their wedding day, as delivery takes anywhere from four to six months.

"We like to have a few months to do alterations," Prussky says. "[That is] not to say we can't do it in three months, but if you have the time, it's better to work ahead."

Many of this year's gowns are strapless – a style that has been strong in recent seasons – but Prussky says some new necklines are coming into the store, including V-necks and modified sweetheart necks, with a little dip in the neckline, as well as off-the-shoulder styles.

"[There is] a variety of options for the girl who doesn't want to go completely strapless," she says.

Strapless gowns have sent some brides to the gym to tone their arm muscles, but most brides don't need to go to that extreme.

"You don't need body-builder arms to wear a strapless gown," Prussky says. "Even larger girls are wearing strapless dresses or bare arms."

The bride who is self-conscious about her arms also has the option of a dress with sleeves, she adds, pointing out that there are many more of those on the market now.

And with such a vast selection of gowns at Ritché's, in sizes 2 to 28, the size 24 bride has as good a chance of finding a flattering a gown as the size 10 bride has. Prussky says her selection of gowns with modified A-line skirts (not as wide as the traditional A-line skirt) or bias cuts are easy for anyone to wear, and they make for a simple, sophisticated look.

For the mother of the bride, Ritché features elegant evening gowns with some beading, long dresses with short bolero jackets and evening suits with beading or metallic-lace detailing.

Almost anything goes for bridesmaids, be it tea length, full-length, strapless, off-the-shoulder or two-piece. A lot of bridesmaids are buying two-piece outfits with mix-and-match tops and skirts.

While growing up as the daughter of the man who created Ritché's, Prussky says she never took much interest in the family business. That changed when her father asked her to come in for a three-month trial after she finished university.

"That was in 1981 and I'm still here," she says.

Family runs in Ritché's clientele, too.

"We do have second- and third-generation brides," Prussky says. "One grandmother got her dress here 50 years ago and now her granddaughter is getting one.

"It's interesting to see what's happened over the last 50 years in bridal fashion."

Videographer blends in with the party

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

A video of a special occasion can recreate the sights, sounds and feelings of the day. Videographer Lisa Feinstein of Lisa Productions (905-764-1033) can capture your simchah for posterity.

As the company's owner and main videographer, Feinstein is known and appreciated for her unobtrusive style when working. She has a way of blending in with a party, and clients often remark that they never noticed her filming.

"Most of the people who book me don't want a lot of lights. They want a professional job, not obtrusive, a realistic memory of the party. The video has the actual ambience of how the party was," Feinstein says.

"Whatever's happening naturally, I take it exactly how it is. It's a comfortable way to work."

She can enhance the video with delicate touches. For instance, a bar or bat mitzvah video can open with a short photo montage of a child growing up, followed by a copy of the invitation.

At the end, there could be a recap of the event played to a fitting song. Lots of options are offered, and clients can order as little or as much as they want.

Feinstein has five children, all close to bar or bat mitzvah age, which she says makes it easy for her to relate to children and the significance of the occasion.

She adds her own special touch at the end of a bar or bat mitzvah party by having the honoree say a few words for the camera.

"A little something of what I would like to see in my own kids, I can get from other kids, things that can make a beautiful memory," she says.

Feinstein also makes video yearbooks for camps, including Camp Northland-B'nai Brith and Camp Robin Hood.

Videographer Lisa Feinstein.

Camp Robin Hood's yearbook video features up to 2,000 kids, and each one is in the video.

She also videotapes bar or bat mitzvah rehearsals, because you can't videotape in shul on Shabbat.

"I'm most proud of the relationship I have with my clients. Every video is as exciting as the one before. I like what I do," Feinstein says.

She also stresses the importance of being able to work well with all the other people involved in a simchah.

"I have a really high respect and rapport with all the tradespeople involved – the photographers, DJs, planners, etc." she says, adding that a good relationship between party professionals "enhances the party that much more. That's very important."

Who is writing your speech?

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

We've all felt the thudding pain of dull speeches. Some of us napped through them, ate or talked over them, and perhaps we wondered: Who wrote this?

Certainly not professional speechwriters, whose job it is to electrify words to shape plodding speakers into memorable orators.

"I take the clay and I mould it," says Joanne Brodkin, of Well Spoken (905-760-0073), on how she describes her role as a speechwriter. She goes on to explain why her service is required, with so much skepticism about hiring a professional to pen a personal story.

"Some people can write but they don't have the time," she says. "Other people don't know how to add flair to the writing and, as we all know, guests get annoyed with lousy speeches."

Annette Cohen-Hoffman agrees.

"Half the speeches I hear are awful, but when I hear a great speech, I know it right away," says the president of My Words, Your Style (416-938-2941). Her company name reflects her business philosophy, she says.

"It may be my words but without the client's style and delivery, my words would never be heard."

Annette Cohen-Hoffman

To achieve that result, Cohen-Hoffman meets with her clients twice to find out the details that will go into the speech. For an entire family that requests speeches, she'll conduct a total of 10 interviews.

To capture a person's essence, Brodkin says she studies a person's syntax and word use, so "it appears that the person wrote it. I don't want them to tell me that they wouldn't use such-and-such word, so I have to find out how they talk."

As well, humour should never elbow into serious business.

"I always think about portraying the person in the most sensitive way," says Cohen-Hoffman.

Cohen-Hoffman charges $118 per speech, which includes a free revision. Additional edits cost $25 each.

Cohen-Hoffman also writes poems, birthday cards, candle lighting speeches and eulogies for $118 each.

She relates a story that portrays her service as almost altruistic. At a wedding three months ago, a family decided to mention an estranged father in a speech after having doubts. Cohen-Hoffman prodded the family into including the father, and her determination was later appreciated: the father died from lung cancer three weeks after the wedding, and the family was able to make amends.

Joanne Brodkin

Speechwriters need to be sympathetic. Brodkin says conveyed emotions are the most memorable area of bar mitzvahs and weddings, and Cohen-Hoffman uses a well-worn but apt cliché: "These words speak from the heart."

A real-estate dealer by day, Cohen-Hoffman says her sales job works with the same intense emotions that constitute speechmaking: compassion, understanding, patience and creativity.

Clients may also assume that writing speed is integral (Brodkin says she can craft a speech in 24 hours), but more lead time is preferable and it is best to write it a month before the event.

Brodkin charges between $125 and $150, and her packages include all meetings and edits.

Ironically, referrals drive the speechwriting business, yet they're also quite difficult to come by since most clients prefer to hide the fact that they hired someone to write their speech.

"Only way after the event do some people admit it," says Brodkin.

"But, after all, [U.S. President George W.] Bush uses speechwriters. Everyone knows that."

In fact, Brodkin met former White House speechwriter David Frum, and she asked for advice on how to further her career. Frum said to her: "Find someone you believe in."

Until political doors open, speechwriters will be crafting gems for someone they believe in: you.

Photographer considers his pictures 'pieces of art'

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Photographs of special affairs provide everlasting memories, so as a party host, you want to ensure that the camera captures your most precious moments, from start to finish.

That's why photographer Adrian Holmes works the room all night long.

"I take pictures until the action has stopped," says Holmes, of Adrian Holmes Photography.

"That's one thing my clients appreciate."

Clients also appreciate when a photographer's sense of style meshes well with their own tastes, he says.

Holmes describes himself as having a contemporary style, although he mixes a flair for the modern with traditional shots, depending on what a client is seeking and the type of affair.

"These days, people are requesting [both] formal [and] more candid images," he says.

Holmes urges prospective party hosts to find a photographer they're comfortable with.

And along with comfort, he advises, make sure the photographer has a keen eye for detail and a quality level that surpasses his or her competitors.

> 'I take pictures until the action has stopped.'

"The images I take have an extra flair to them," Holmes said. "That's my style."

Holmes says his photographs "tell a story."

At one affair, he took a series of shots that captured the bride's day, from her time getting ready right up to the moment of the ceremony.

"I put these images together using digital technology in a collage poster," he said.

"When you look at the different pieces, you get a feeling for the whole night."

These days, an increasing number of photographers are using digital technology, but Holmes says there is still an allure for taking shots the old-fashioned way.

"I like to think of my images as more than just pictures," he said. "I like to them of them as pieces of art."

To contact Adrian Holmes, call 416-481-9522.

Annie's Art House 'almost an overnight success'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Fun and creativity are a winning combination at Annie's Art House (416-781-7767), a party venue that appeals to children of all ages.

The art centre, located at 3177 Bathurst St., holds parties with custom-designed projects for boys and girls in a wide variety of age ranges.

You can also find Annie's art tables at bar and bat mitzvahs. In fact, adults are even throwing parties at Annie's for showers and special birthdays.

Lisa Litowitz, the owner of Annie's, says she set out to create a different kind of party experience. "The parties are fantastic. The kids are totally engaged. It's an interactive experience. The kids are so proud of their creations."

She describes the projects as "funky and functional. Many of the parents want to dig in and do the crafts themselves, and they do. That creative excitement has led to adult parties, showers, 40th birthdays and more."

Litowitz prides herself on her wide selection of projects, which include painting T-shirts, beaded jewelry, mosaic mirrors, decoupage tissue boxes and Shrinky Dink charm bracelets.

"We custom-tailor the theme of the project to the client or child's interest. For instance, we had one client whose son loved trains, so we put trains around bulletin boards, which the kids painted.

"We also do a lot of princess parties. The kids make crowns and wands."

All the creations are wrapped up in a fancy loot bag and parents can "jazz up the bag" if they wish, says Litowitz.

Annie's has two studios and can accommodate up to 28 people for an event. For parties, one room is used for the art activity and the second is set up for the party.

The fee of $20 per person includes the art supplies, invitations and gift wrapping, says Litowitz. "We provide great staff, so the parents can watch and enjoy the experience. Our talented and supportive staff make the parties and fun and stimulating."

Annie's also offers weekly art lessons for children of all ages on site, as well as after-school and lunchtime programs at a number of local schools. The art centre also plans programs and trains staff for the arts and crafts programs at Zodiac Swim and Specialty Camp and Camp Wahanowin.

A group of happy children at an event hosted by Annie's Art House

It's an impressive slate of activities, especially considering that Annie's Art House only opened in the fall of 2001.

"It was almost an overnight success," says Litowitz. "We ran our first day of parties in the summer of 2001 before we even opened. There was a great demand for the service."

Litowitz started the art centre after leaving the corporate world. She had been a fashion buyer with an extensive travel schedule, but the lifestyle was hard on her young family.

When she saw the Bathurst Street storefront vacant – it was formerly a beauty parlour– she tried to think of a business that would suit the location.

"I tried to figure what would be an interesting business to serve the community."

She decided it would make an excellent venue for art parties and programs to serve young families in the neighbourhood.

"We offer a special twist to what we do. We carry unique supplies and we have wonderful artists and students on staff."

Today, parties make up 50 per cent of the business, she says.

The business is named after Litowitz's late grandmother, Anne Litowitz, who lived in the neighbourhood and frequented the store when it was a beauty parlour. "She had her hair done there for 30 years."

For Litowitz, Annie's Art House allows her to combine her creativity with her business savvy.

"I am really enjoying myself because I'm combining my love of business and my creative artistic side."

And she's always on scouting out new projects. "I'm always looking for unique ideas and treatments and supplies to stay current. That's why we say our art is funky and functional."

She says the classes and camps have not yet repeated any of their art projects.

"I go to hobby trade shows and fashion trade shows in my search for inspiration and new materials. Creating the ideas and programs is my favourite part of the business."

Annie's is also enjoyed by Litowitz's two children, Leah Goldstein, 6, and Sammy Goldstein, 8. "My kids help test projects and join in many of the weekly programs. My husband [Robbie] also helps out. It's a real family affair."

The Chocolate Moose makes simchahs sweet

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The Chocolate Moose (2839 Bathurst St.) is a very sweet place. The store is brimming with a wide selection of chocolates – as well as nut brittles and nougats – in all kinds of shapes and sizes.

"We do pareve and chalav Yisrael," says Bev Kruger, owner and founder of The Chocolate Moose (416-784-9092).

Chocolate is ideal for any simchah or celebration, she says. "Any time is an occasion for chocolate. Chocolate goes with everything."

She stresses that she uses the finest quality Belgian chocolate, and the parve chocolate is usually 53 per cent cocoa.

She notes that chocolate with 70 per cent cocoa, which has been shown to have some health benefits, is also available at Chocolate Moose.

All the chocolate is handmade on the premises, from tempering to moulding, and The Chocolate Moose is known for its custom work, Kruger says.

Smash cakes are very popular, she adds. "We can customize the cake for whatever theme people want.

"We do moulds of flowers, sports items and animals. We just did a Noah's ark as part of a sweet table, for the centrepiece."

The Chocolate Moose also carries a wide array of filled chocolates. The chocolate turtles and nut brittles are very popular items, Kruger says.

A delicious novelty item is the chocolate fountain, she says. "We rent it out for parties. It's usually part of a sweet table. The chocolate flows continuously. People dip fruit, cookies and marshmallows into the chocolate."

The Chocolate Moose also offers holiday trays and customized gift baskets for all occasions and corporate gifts, Kruger says. "We have a selection of gift-ware and collectibles that can be customized with various chocolates. We also do delivery."

The Chocolate Moose began as a home business some 10 years ago. "It started out as a hobby, a nice small second income," Kruger says. "Then it took over my life, and that was it."

Originally she worked out of the tiny kitchen at Ohr Somayach on Bathurst Street south of Lawrence Avenue. When she had to vacate those premises about five years ago, she had a choice, she says: "Close up shop or expand."

> 'Any time is an occasion for chocolate. Chocolate goes with everything.'

Demand had been growing, so Kruger moved the business to its present storefront location at Bathurst and Glencairn, and she hired some assistants.

"When we moved here, the business took off. I'm grateful to have excellent staff to assist me."

Kruger says providing excellent service is very important. "We take pride in what we do, and we try and accommodate people as much we can. We try to make people happy.

"We're always catering to a simchah. This is a happy and sweet business."

Is men's fashion history repeating itself?

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Strict dress codes and the wear-anything approach both make life easy, but in different ways. With the former, you're spared the effort of choice, whereas the latter look lets you follow your impulses.

For many companies, even at the height of the casual trend, a white or light-blue shirt, tie and suit remained the rule. Today, more firms are following a trend toward dressing up.

Occupation and context also play a role in determining style. Bankers dress conservatively because someone who's cautious with clothing is considered more likely to manage your money cautiously. From someone who writes ad copy, people expect more flair. And, in many cases, office wear is less formal than what you wear when seeing clients.

Bottom line: real life is complex, and you still need to make decisions. Mark Weinberg of Ponti Menswear (905-513-7772), and Jeff Skurka of Classica Imports (416-785-8146) have some ideas that may help you.

Weinberg ascribes the move away from casual wear partly to the economy. Competition is stiff, and everyone wants to make a positive first impression.

"You have to look the part," he says, and power dressing tells everyone that you're reliable.

Skurka agrees. "It's tuxes for a wedding, and suits for the office," he says. (He adds that with a tux, the long tie is in and the bow tie out.)

But power dressing has gained in elegance, Weinberg states. Details such as French cuffs and monogrammed sleeves are in, for instance.

For a bar mitzvah, Skurka says, it's harder to decide what to wear. The teen crowd's idea of party wear is likely to differ from that of their elders, to say the least. And the two or three generations of adults at a bar mitzvah party will each dress differently.

For some things, Skurka finds it harder to talk about trends. Some men, for example, want the traditional two-button tuxedo, but he's selling lots of three-button tuxes too. Formal black and grey ties with white shirts are in, but accessories such as cummerbunds and suspenders are out.

But casual office wear has become sophisticated and classy, with quality materials and workmanship, Weinberg notes. In some offices, "casual" means a jacket and tie, but in a wider range of fabrics, colours and patterns. And where a tie is not de rigueur, Skurka observes, pullovers with casual, dressy pants are often popular.

In both Weinberg's and Skurka's opinions, newer fabrics encourage the trend to formality, because they make dressing up comfortable. These materials range widely in price, but even the cheaper ones are light and strong, and they tend not to wrinkle much.

Among the most important new fabrics, Weinberg names microfibres and "super 120s" in wools. Both he and Skurka also take special note of Italian stretch corduroys, which fit well without wrinkling or bulging.

Trends in clothing are cyclical, Weinberg says. The cycles start with young people, who want to distinguish themselves from the older generation. With the passage of time, this young generation becomes the establishment, only to be succeeded by a generation of youngsters who don't want to look like them.

Weinberg has seen a dandy phase where men wear flashier clothes, followed by a tendency to become more casual, followed by a tendency to dress up, but in a less flashy, more elegant way.

So history does repeat itself, but with variations. "Flat black and blue," observes Weinberg, "are still 90 per cent of my suit sales." But new fabrics and weaving technology have made textures more interesting, and you're more likely to see a herringbone or diagonal weave than in days past.

Skurka has noticed a strong interest in double button cuffs. And a lot of young men want a shirt they can wear outside their pants, not tucked in.

People seldom give clothes as gifts anymore, Skurka says. Fit and taste vary too much from person to person, and there's more variety on the shelves, to suit personal preferences.

Fashions or not, you have to be comfortable with your clothes, both in body and in mind. When you buy a garment, advises Weinberg, consider your own physique and preferences.

And when you shop at a good store, Weinberg says, the sales staff will take your body build and preferences into consideration, so listen to them. They're not just interested in making one sale – they want you to be happy with what you buy, so you'll come back.

Consultants help ensure everything runs smoothly

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Every simchah should create beautiful memories, and sometimes a little help is needed to ensure everything runs smoothly, with no glitches. Party consultants Sheryl and Irv Bielas of An Event to Remember, (905-771-0038), provide sound advice and bring years of experience to their clients.

The party consultant acts as a liaison between the client and party professionals. Be it a bar or bat mitzvah, wedding or corporate function, the consultant can attend meetings with photographers, florists, orchestra leaders or others involved in the event, and advise the client about decisions that need to be made. In the days leading up to the event, he or she confirms that all necessary people and arrangements are in place for the big day.

On the day of the party, the consultants continue working closely with the party professionals so that everything runs smoothly. Sheryl notes they can help in creating "party or colour themes, room décor, special audio-visual presentations and floor plans."

Working with one of Toronto's top event planners for several years, Sheryl was able to hone her organizational skills while developing good relationships with many party professionals. More recently, as parents of two grown daughters, she and her husband have become more aware of the wishes of a bar and bat mitzvah. They help ensure that all attending enjoy themselves, whether teenager or teetotaler. Their skills can be helpful in speechwriting, candlelighting or special toasts.

Sheryl remembers one event in particular. The sprinkler systems went off right when the father was giving his speech. "We were able to calm everyone down, take care of things, and they ended up having a great party."

So don't throw water on your next party. Call Sheryl and let her make yours an event to remember.

Linens and centrepieces make your party

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

In a party room, it's the decorations that are first thing to stand out, and the decorations you have can make the dreariest dungeon look like a castle.

Chair Décor (905-731-9217, www.chairdecor.com) is known for its linens and chair rentals, and is one of the largest specialty rental houses in the country for chair covers. Based in Toronto, Chair Décor has more than 50,000 chair covers and 35,000 table covers and linens to choose from, in every colour under the rainbow.

Jordan Rich, the company's director of operations, says the trend in chair covers and decorations is leaning toward elegant but simple designs and smooth contours. Earthy tones such as brown, sand, coral and tan are very popular this year. For bar mitzvahs, he usually does bright, fun colours. For weddings, contemporary styles, white and ivory linens and embroidered organzas are the norm.

"We are known for our service and quality," says Rich. "Someone is available 24/7 in case something happens, and we are in close contact with all the major facilities in the city."

When investigating linen and chair cover rentals, Rich says to keep a few things in mind.

"Know your colour scheme," he says.

Equally important, he says, is to know your budget, location, and the approximate number of guests.

"Often people come to us after they've booked the hall and have everything planned out. They should come to us as early as possible, at least six to 12 months in advance."

Chair Décor, which gives free consultations, has recently started to offer chiavari chairs – high-end bamboo chairs that are popular for weddings.

When it comes to exotic centrepieces, Tammy Heisel (905-770-9335, www.tammyswebsite.ca) specializes in designing unique decorations for theme parties and creating unique, hand-painted pieces that attract attention. As the owner of Artistic Creations, Heisel has been in the party business for more than 13 years. Although she has recently moved to Rochester, Heisel assures that it's business as usual on the Canadian side of Lake Ontario, and is in Toronto nearly every weekend for an event.

Some of the most popular themes she receives requests for are sports themes – usually hockey – and cartoon characters.

For her most recent party – with a Monopoly theme – she painted Monopoly characters on lightweight Styrofoam board, avoiding the traditional thick boards that are widely used because they look "fake." When dry, thin Styrofoam looks like wood. Most of her centrepieces are made from scratch.

The painted pieces are often mounted to clear tubes with lights threaded through their bases to give an ethereal look.

"They are practical because people can see through them," she says, thus avoiding the common party problem of centrepieces interfering with guests making eye contact across the table.

In addition to centrepieces, Heisel also does personalized printing on cloth – she has printed on all sorts of clothing, from shirts to boxer shorts – and balloon decorations.

Often, customers come to her looking to throw a party with an unusual theme.

"We like to hear what the kids like. We can work around it, and in the end the kids feel like it's their party," she says.

Sometimes customers will have an exact theme in mind. Other times, she helps them brainstorm something unique that suits the bar or bat mitzvah child. She recommends setting up initial appointments with her earlier rather than later, with six months being the minimum amount of time needed to prepare for a simchah.

Heisel has recently expanded into giveaways. Curing Kisses lip glosses are personalized and come in a variety of colours. A portion of the proceeds from each pot of lip gloss goes to a charity selected by the host, and Heisel makes the donation on the bar or bat mitzvah child's behalf. She says the lip glosses have become very popular, and many hosts and hostesses like the idea of giving something to charity to celebrate the occasion.

PARTY PLANNER

Overseeing party plans

As a great organizer with a keen eye for details, consultant Gayle Kertzman, (416-484-4467), can help to quash wedding day jitters.

Kertzman specializes in wedding consultation. She will help plan the day from its earliest stages right up "until the bride throws the bouquet." Lately she has noticed more of a need for "day of" services.

Kertzman explains that especially where people are marrying for second and third times, the couple is mostly looking for "someone to oversee their thoughts, ideas and plans."

Many more of the men want to be involved in the planning process now than in former years. "I'm actually working a lot with the grooms," Kertzman notes.

She recalled one wedding where the groom was to sing to his new bride during his speech. When the band was away on break, some fancy footwork on Kertzman's part got them back in place just in time to accompany him. The song was well received, with a standing ovation.

Kertzman is always prepared for unwanted surprises on the day of the wedding. "I always come with a suitcase full of emergency supplies, if a button falls off, or the bride's dress gets dirty. They need that kind of assurance that if something like that does happen, there's always someone there to look after those small details. And you don't realize how many until it's actually happening."

In addition to wedding consultation, Gayle can coordinate spa parties at home that are great for showers or for the bride's guests. Relaxing with a massage, manicure or pedicure is one more way to melt away pre-wedding jitters.

Gail Kertzman (left) can help to quash wedding day jitters.

Special to The CJN

Whether your goal on your special day is to simply look your best or as glamorous as a Hollywood star on the red carpet, you're in good hands with beauty experts Orna and Eli.

Billed as "Your Israeli Hairstylists," Orna and Eli's recently opened boutique (905-886-5900) offers a taste of top Israeli fashion in Thornhill. In the store, Israeli coffee, music and newspapers are all served up while Hebrew and English conversation fills the air.

After many years running two couture salons in Tel Aviv, one in Ben Yehuda and the other in Bougrashov, the husband and wife team of Eli and Orna Abitbol decided to try to woo Toronto.

Well-known in Israel, Orna and Eli had many high-profile clients. Eli was widely recognized as a top men's stylist, working on such celebrities as Dudu Topaz, Chaim Topol, Yehuda Barkan and various figures from both the Knesset halls and soccer fields.

Orna is recognized for her ability to work with colour. At L'Oreal-sponsored hair shows in Israel, Orna not only did hair-colouring, but also fixed other stylist's colouring jobs gone wrong.

The full-service hair salon currently offers manicures and pedicures, but will be expanding soon to include facials and other beauty treatments.

Once your hair is looking fabulous, it's time to bring out the best in your face.

Candice Ornstein, owner of C.O. Make-Up Inc. (416-927-8928), can add the final touches to your elegant party look.

Orna Abitbol with satisfied client Sarit Hadad, an Israeli performer.

Ornstein began her career at McGill University, where she majored in theatre. After she graduated, she completed a program in Toronto at Complexions International.

Professionally trained as a make-up artist for film, Ornstein explains how she began doing bridal make-up.

"I really work in film and television, but wanted to branch out to the everyday person and make them feel good," she says.

Who better to know the tricks of looking good than someone who works with celebrities?

With "famous people, you can't fool them," Ornstein says. "They make their money on their appearance."

Convenience is another aspect of Ornstein's service. She brings a trolley loaded with her equipment to wherever the client wants to be made up. Everything is completely hygienic, and tools that aren't disposable are cleaned with 99 per cent alcohol. Each person is given a customized lip palate and brush for maintaining their finished look throughout the evening.

Ornstein is sensitive to the artistry of make-up.

"What you bring to a person's face is your artistic ability… two make-up artists won't really do a face the same. I always make sure the client feels 100 per cent comfortable and to go within their range."

Someone who doesn't really wear make-up doesn't want to be made up that heavily, she says, otherwise it will look "over the top."

PARTY PLANNER

From traditional to the latest trends, kosher caterers have it all

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There's one axiom that can be applied to all simchahs with a top-notch kosher caterer: nobody leaves the party hungry.

From the hot and cold hors d'oeuvres and appetizers to the sumptuous main course and the delectable sweet table, it may be virtually impossible to find a hungry guest, other than perhaps someone on a restricted diet.

Jewish people love to celebrate with food, and local kosher caterers such as It's an Occasion (416-785-0996), Sam Firestone Caterers (416-782-8022) and Rose Lazar Catering Services (416-633-0344) are all happy to serve up a feast for their clients and their guests.

Raizelle Serebrowski, of It's an Occasion has been cooking since she was 10. She was a religious school teacher for 20 years and says she dabbled in catering before she changed careers and went into catering full time. "The business kind of came to my doorstep," she says.

She was delivering a cake that someone ordered for a Sheva Brachot when the owner of the dairy, vegetarian and pareve catering company Chilies and Meringue asked if Serebrowski, would like to take over the business. Serebrowski moved into the storefront premises at 596 Marlee Ave. near Glencairn.

Since then, she has become the exclusive caterer at B'nai Torah Congregation (455 Patricia Ave.) where she does pareve and meat catering. Serebrowski stresses that one does not need to be a member of the shul to use the hall, which can hold up to 320 people.

"In January, February and March 2004, there is no charge for the hall rental for parties of 50 or more."

It's an Occasion offers a large variety of meat, dairy and pareve dishes to choose from, says Serebrowski. "We have great appetizers and they're all hand-made."

Sautéed eggplant in phyllo dough, baked spring rolls and chicken kabobs, are among the wide selection of hors d'oeuvres. Main course selections include a host of chicken and beef dishes, and Serebrowski finds that many people are requesting fish.

"A lot of people are into lighter eating. Fish fits the bill."

Thai salmon phyllo bundles, grilled tuna on a skewer with pineapple salsa, and sea bass balsamico are among her most popular fish dishes. She offers a wide choice of interesting salads, such as oriental snow peas with ginger dressing, green bean and mango salad and grilled eggplant and tomato salad with balsamic dressing, as well as such dairy specialties as moussaka, blintzes and quiches of all kinds.

She says her apple cranberry crumble cake is "famous," and she was one of the first people to introduce a chocolate fountain as a sweet table novelty item.

Serebrowski prides herself on the service. "I'm very people oriented. The key to making a simchah a success is organization, as well as being nice.

"The simchah should be above what the clients dreamed of. The simchah, the food, the ambience should be better than what they expected."

David Lazar of Rose Lazar Catering Services (416-633-0344) grew up in the food business. His mother Rose Lazar started a kosher catering business 40 years ago, he says. "She saw that kosher catering was a niche that had to be filled."

The business has always been a family affair, says Lazar. "When I was younger, I did bartending, delivering and helping out with kitchen prep work."

And while he runs the business these days, other family members pitch in as well. His wife does quality control, a sister is on call, his children help out with bartending and delivery, and his mother still likes to come in to work when she's not in Florida.

The business is run out of the Lodzer Centre Congregation (12 Heaton St.), and service is available at private banquet halls and parties. "We're known in the city for providing consistent, high quality food. We're always available for the customers and we're always at the simchahs."

Some of Rose Lazar's specialties include sesame orange chicken, veal Marsala and veal scaloppini, says Lazar. "We're famous for our mushroom crepes. We make about 1,000 a week. We've been making them since the business began."

Another popular item is Dutch potatoes, he says. An Idaho potato is scooped out and piped back with a yam strip on top.

Lazar notes that home-style comfort foods like roast potatoes, brisket of beef and kishka are back in style. "People are asking for these foods. They remember them from simchahs of their earlier days."

Rose Lazar also offers the most current foods such as sushi stations, chicken satay, shish kabob and skewered beef teriyaki as part of the wide selection of hot and cold hors d'oeuvres. The company makes 90 per cent of its desserts, says Lazar.

"The most favourite is the chocolate lemon mousse cake. It can be served for dessert or as part of the sweet table."

Sam Firestone is the exclusive caterer for Shaarei Shomayim Congregation

He says that over the years, the company gets a lot of repeat business and has done many simchahs for the same families.

"We have one person – we did her baby naming and now we're doing her grandchild."

Another long-established kosher catering company, Sam Firestone Catering (416-782-8022) has also done simchahs for multiple generations of the same family. According to Leslie Firestone, who has taken over the business his father Sam started in 1966, there is a lot of history.

"We've seen a lot of simchahs from the same families. My dad would have married a couple and I'm doing the bar mitzvahs of their children. There's one family where my dad did the wedding and the children's bar mitzvahs and now I'm doing the weddings of the kids."

Sam Firestone is the exclusive caterer for Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, 470 Glencairn Ave.

Leslie Firestone, who has been running the business since 1991, says the banquet facilities at the shul are open to the public.

"We welcome non-members to use the facilities. You don't have to be a member of Shaarei Shomayim to use the social hall and sanctuary and our catering service."

Nobody leaves the party hungry

He notes that non-members can use the hall for evening bar mitzvah parties, weddings, sports banquets and fundraisers, as well as for more intimate affairs like Sheva Brachot and anniversary parties.

Having grown up in the business, Firestone has seen many food trends come and go.

"Nouveau cuisine is still popular. There is also a demand for Moroccan dishes." Moroccan food has become very popular, he says.

"We do a lot of chicken breasts stuffed with grilled vegetables. We use a lot of couscous and different dips like babaganoush, hummus and caponata, a Mediterranean grilled vegetable dip."

Main courses in big demand are sea bass or salmon with apricot mango chutney or ginger teriyaki sauce, broiled fresh lake trout, prime rib, tricolour peppercorn steak, Cornish hen and phyllo chicken breast stuffed with couscous, leeks or grilled vegetables.

"We do a lot with grilled vegetables. Grilled vegetables are huge," says Firestone, noting that the grilled vegetables, which are served in a stack, include sweet potatoes, zucchini, portobello mushrooms, coloured peppers and red onions.

Firestone grew up in the food business. "I sat in on interviews. I was always dropping by the synagogue to help. I joined my dad for food shows."

The company has also had the same executive chef, Jimmy Lyras, for 35 years, says Firestone. He knows many of the clients.

He said when his father started the business there were very few kosher caterers, but there is a lot more competition today. "We've had to get very innovative."

In the old days, his father would handle everything in a single phone call, but today Firestone says he'll have three or four face-to-face meetings with clients to ensure success.

"I handle everything myself, from creating the menus, right down to staying for the parties – I want to know that everything went according to plan, that everything was perfect. I'm there to welcome the hosts and to say good night. That's the service we offer."

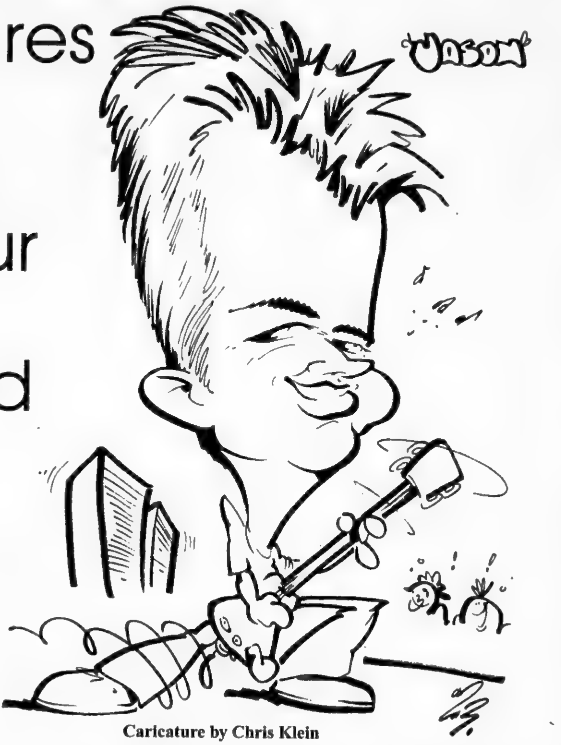
Caricatures and beading keep your guests occupied



Caricature by Chris Klein

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

One of the challenges of planning a large function such as a bar or bat mitzvah is keeping guests entertained before the meal is served and before the dance floor opens up.

Filling that time and keeping guests engaged is Chris Klein's specialty. The Toronto-based caricaturist (416-391-3774) sketches portraits that appeal to audiences aged three to 120.

And caricatures allow guests to take home a personalized gift that is more meaningful than an inflatable party favour, Klein says.

In his 10 years drawing caricatures, Klein has mastered the art of the quick stroke. Within five minutes, his drawings are usually complete.

He says he has noticed that when he draws, guests – usually children – like to gather behind him and watch their friends' pictures take shape with each brush of his pen.

Klein describes the guests' reactions like that of an inside joke shared between close friends. For a few minutes, the person posing for the portrait can't see what is happening on the other side of the easel, while the guests behind Klein can see the result and comment on it.

When searching for a caricature artist, Klein recommends looking for someone who can draw quickly and capture the features of guests. And caricaturists, like other specialties, should be booked at least three to four weeks in advance.

For smaller or more intimate events such as birthday parties or bridal showers, an activity such as beading can keep guests happily occupied with making their own personalized jewelry.

Sabrina Smith (905-709-6562), owner of Beadology, does exactly that. Her unique projects let youngsters – and the young-at-heart – create their own custom jewelry with themes such as Tutti Frutti or Mardi Gras.

Smith says necklaces and bracelets are popular with girls, but she says boys also love making keychains and necklaces with wooden beads and carved bone pendants.

Children enjoy a fun evening of making their own jewelry with Beadology.

Beading makes for an excellent exercise for children

Often, guests leave a party wearing jewelry that they made themselves. "The quality looks like it was bought in a shop," Smith says. "You can make something that looks like art, but with your own sense of style."

Beading requires fine motor skills, which makes it an excellent exercise for children, Smith says, noting that she also runs beading workshops at elementary schools in York Region.

She recommends allowing one hour to 90 minutes to make a piece of jewelry from start to finish. In addition to providing all the beads, wires and equipment, Smith gives guests small organza bags to store their new creations in.

Although Smith's focus is on children's parties, she also does bridal showers. For adult events, she has about 70 different themes to choose from, with varying levels of difficulty.

Party planners prove their worth in new documentary

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

In an unusual twist, a pair of party planners will be front and centre in an upcoming documentary – tentatively called Weddings Unveiled – to be aired on The Learning Channel this winter.

"Wedding shows usually feature the bride and groom, but this time the show is about us and what we do," says Sarah Cherry, who along with Marsha Baker runs Cherry & Baker and Associates (905-771-1121).

The premise of the show, says Baker, is to demonstrate how event planners arrange an event from beginning to end.

They were followed, among other places, from a meeting with a client to a bridal fitting, then to a rehearsal, and then to a food tasting. "The bride wanted a different kind of wedding cake, so we suggested levels of cupcakes. Our tasting was taped," she says.

For the documentary, the pair chose to highlight a wedding day with a challenge, Baker says. "There are going to be more than 400 guests, and after the service, we have one hour to turn the room into a dining room."

They want viewers to come away with the knowledge that wedding planners certainly make life easier, says Cherry. "We can make [the planning process] and the party worry-free."

Planners can get involved from the time an idea for an event is conceived, she says. "We offer a full-service package in which we are there from the first day, or else we can just come to the event. We offer complete consulting services, including decor, make-up, hairstyling and invitations, and we can customize a package for any budget," says Baker.

They get so involved with their clients, says Cherry, "that sometimes we walk away from an event a little sad because we've spent a lot of time together.

"We have one client who had to cancel her original party because of SARS, and we handled all the cancelling and rescheduling. She was so attached to us by the time the party actually happened that we've become good friends. We're not consultants that just walk away," Cherry says.

Another client had encountered some problems with parking at the hotel where a party was being held. "We contacted the hotel and made sure the bride was compensated. Our job does not end when the party ends," says Baker.

They carry with them an array of items to the event, including needle and thread, extra pantyhose, headache pills and extra bowties. "We even have a spare ketubah and a glass to break under the chuppah. We've learned from our clients what to bring. If someone asks for something we don't have, you can be sure we'll have it next time," says Baker.

In addition to "small emergencies," the pair are ready to handle real emergencies, Cherry says.

"We were at one wedding where a woman had a heart attack. We noticed a commotion around her and calmly called 911. The big thing we had to do was walk around with a calm attitude."

They also "police" the room to make sure kids are behaving appropriately, and that no one who has been drinking plans to drive their car. "On behalf of the hosts, we try to make sure everyone will get home safely," says Baker.

Choosing the right musicians key to a great party

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Since there is such a variety of musical sounds, it is important that the band at your affair plays for your pleasure.

Mark Selby

"If you're going to pay for it, make sure you get what you want," advises Raisy Ordel of the 42nd Street band.

"I have to cater to the client's needs."

Ordel says a band that is able to please clients is versatile and has the musical gift "to accommodate every age."

That could mean playing anything from jazz and swing to the current pop hits.

Ordel notes that except for the drummer, all members of 42nd Street sing, which provides for a wide and exciting range of sounds when the band performs.

"My philosophy is that I do every job as if it were my last," she says. "And I have to go out with a bang."

Ordel says throughout the affair, the music should flow without lulls and the tempo and volume should be in synch with speeches and meals.

"For instance, in between courses, we pick it up," she says. "[Softer] music allows for conversation at the tables."

While the main party portion of an affair is usually when the music booms, background music during cocktails adds to the ambience.

Mark Selby is a cocktail pianist who says background music offers "a nice piece of entertainment before the [main party]."

Selby tailors his repertoire of songs to the age range of guests, and he usually plays for about one hour.

On some occasions, clients request more than the piano, and in those cases, he has included a vocalist, harpist or whatever a client wants.

With or without those extras, Selby says he offers your guests a treat.

"At some parties, you get a loot bag on the way out," he says. "With a [cocktail pianist], you get it on the way in."

The 42nd Street band has played at weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs, corporate affairs and has also performed on boat cruises.

Selby plays at similar functions and has also entertained audiences at university formals.

Shower the bride with a variety of themes

Legend has it that the first bridal shower was hosted for a Dutch bride with a broken heart. It seems her father refused to give her a dowry because she intended to marry an indigent miller.

The young couple decided to marry despite her father's lack of financial and emotional support. Evidently, the groom's friends pitched in and "showered" the bride with gifts of household necessities for the couple's new home. Thanks to the "showering" of gifts, the bride's heart mended and her cupboard was full.

Today, bridal showers are a tradition, and are made by a bride's friends, business acquaintances and relatives. Furthermore, showers have branched out to include other auspicious events, such as the impending birth of a baby, the purchase of a new home and retirement farewells.

> Regardless of the social occasion, showers revolve around a theme

Regardless of the social occasion, showers revolve around a theme. It is common for a bride to have several different types of showers, all on different themes that serve as icebreakers and contribute to the ambience of the occasion.

Here is a listing of some of these themes.

ABC theme: On the invitation, each guest is assigned a letter of the alphabet. Whatever the letter, the guest brings a gift starting with that letter. (For example, "L" for lingerie.) Assigned letters can also spell the bride's name.

Specialty wedding items: A shower of this type provides the bride with many of the little extras for the wedding that she might not buy for herself. The hostess should confer with guests to prevent duplication of items.

Gourmet gadget shower: Cuisine is the theme. Guests bring a recipe, along with a piece of equipment to prepare it. (For example, a poacher with a recipe for poached salmon.)

Round-the-clock shower: On the invitation, guests are assigned an hour of the day. They are challenged to provide a functional gift related to that time. For the time 7 a.m., for example, an automatic coffee maker would be an appropriate choice. To add to the fun, guests may also write a poem to accompany the gift.

The big picture: Everyone brings a photo for the bride and/or groom with a caption. Photos are displayed on a board that the couple keeps. The couple will treasure the sentiment and everyone will learn more about the couple. This theme leads to friendly conversation.

Kitchen shower: Again, poems can accompany gifts to serve as effective icebreakers. Household accessories such as spice racks, canisters, knives and trivets are appreciated gifts.

Fitness shower: Today's health-conscious couples need gifts to keep in shape. Presents can range from sports gear to gift certificates such as a membership to the Jewish community centre. A cool idea for a party atmosphere is to set up a juice bar for refreshments and have a sporty décor theme. The buffet can include crunchy carrots, celery and fresh fruit platters. A bathroom scale, a nonstick skillet, hand-held weights and other exercise gear are other ideal gifts.

Look good, feel good shower: At this kind of party, guests shower the bride with gifts to help her feel rejuvenated, such as make-up, beauty certificates for pedicures, facials, reflexology, spa services and aqua-fitness lessons.

Lingerie showers: Everything from fancy tea gowns and elegant lingerie to sporty night shirts and terry cloth robes fit this theme.

Jewish customs and ceremonies: For couples who will observe Jewish holidays and ceremonial events throughout their lives, this type of theme works well. Among the many meaningful items are Shabbat candleholders, a menorah, a kiddush cup, a challah cloth, a challah tray, a Passover seder plate, a haggadah and a mezuzah.

There is no end to the diversity of shower themes. Discuss your ideas with the bride because you want to do something she finds interesting, creative and, above all, useful.

Young Israeli Yemenites revive pre-nuptial henna ceremony

By SHARON KANON
Israel Press Service

Guests begin to trickle in for the henna, or hinne, ceremony scheduled for 7:30 p.m. at the WIZO Club in Rehovot, located on a secluded driveway off Herzl Street. Ora Melamad waits outside to greet her guests. "Yes, this is the right place," she says. The mother of the bride-to-be introduces herself. She is trying to appear calm, but is obviously quite emotional. "Merav is my only daughter; an only child," she says.

The colourful hinne ceremony is held by Jews from Sephardi countries about a week before a wedding and symbolizes the bittersweet separation of the young bride from her family. Over the past 30 years, interest in the custom has waned and few Sephardi brides have chosen to hold the ceremony. In recent years, however, increasing numbers of young Israelis of Yemenite origin have been keen to revive it and demonstrate a return to tradition.

Inside the WIZO Club, a stage is transformed by oriental rugs that form a backdrop for the ceremony. The beautiful rugs on the floor are original and handmade in Yemen. At the back of the room, two young chefs in traditional Yemenite dress are preparing lehuch, deftly flipping the pancake-like bread in eight pans set on the buffet table. Guests will fill the pancake with hummus, salad, a tomato-based sauce, brown-boiled eggs and shoug, a spicy Yemenite condiment. Later, several other Yemenite dishes – malawah and jachnun – will be added to the buffet. The main beverage is mint-flavoured lemonade in a large punch bowl.

The bride-to-be is getting dressed in a small adjacent room, or, to be more precise, is being dressed by two elderly Yemenite women. Petite Merav seems to be thoroughly enjoying the preparations. A natural beauty, she has donned a beautiful gold-threaded dress, pantaloons and slippers. A heavy necklace with several strands of red and orange amber beads and silver filigree balls is placed around her neck over a long gold bib that helps to bear the weight. In the centre are three round silver circles of gradually increasing size that represent the sun, and on the bottom, a silver case for psalms.

Then comes the jewelry – vast amounts of it. The women dressers adorn each of Merav's arms with four silver filigree bracelets, while rings made by Yemenite silversmiths renowned for their craftsmanship are placed on every finger.

"The costume weighs 10 kilograms," says dresser Mazal Zioni. "This symbolizes the heavy burden that the young bride is going to be taking on when she marries."

The headdress is the final adornment. It consists of an exquisite gold-embroidered hood scarf, called a gargush, which is draped over the head and shoulders. Over this is placed an even more elaborate headpiece, the tashbuk, a tall conical crown framed by a garland of fresh flowers and branches of shadaf, a green herb, similar to rue, believed to ward off the evil eye. Then lavish ear hangings are suspended from the headdress and across the chest, which is itself draped with necklaces of silver and coral beads, pearls, amulet cases and silver bells.

Taking a break to eat a lehuch filled with hummus and salad, 22-year-old Merav tells me she is studying bookkeeping at a college in Bnei Brak. The groom, Hanan Meshulam, 25, is studying at a yeshiva in Jerusalem and hopes to become a religious court judge. The couple met through a shidduch suggested by friends of the parents four months before. They chat easily during the final adornment and picture-taking, clearly comfortable in each other's company.

Hanan's family comes from Rosh Ha'ayin, a city with one of the largest concentrations of Yemenites in Israel. He wanted his bride to have the henna ceremony.

Reviving the pre-nuptial henna ceremony

"Both my mother and my grandmother had it," he said.

Although the hinne is an all-women affair, Hanan agrees to don a ceremonial wedding robe, including a cap with peyot (long curls) attached.

"I'm not allowed to stay and watch the women dance or listen to the singing," said the groom. "According to tradition, Merav and I cannot see or talk to each for the next few days, until the wedding. It is very hard."

On reaching the hall, guests and family surround Merav, join hands and break into spontaneous dance – the intricate steps of the Yemenite dances familiar to all the guests, including Merav's Ashkenazi friends from college. Yet the music is provided by a hip-looking DJ (a touch of modern culture) and the guests are dressed in everything from jeans and long-toed stiletto heels to suits and stylish dresses.

After an hour or so of dancing, Merav leaves the hall to change her costume for the second procession. She is surrounded by friends and relatives, most of whom have now changed into traditional Yemenite garb to add some additional colour to the evening. Merav changes into a black robe, red gargush and silver jewelry. Family members again escort her back to her guests, encircled with flowers and candles and accompanied by singing and drumming, to continue the lively dancing – for it is a mitzvah to make the bride happy.

After all the preliminaries, Merav leaves the hall to change yet again – the actual henna ceremony is about to take place. Dressed in a black robe trimmed with red and gold, and with a beautiful striped red and gold headscarf and no jewelry (typical of dress in a northern Yemenite village), Merav is ready for the third procession. Along with the drum-playing dressers, who sing traditional henna songs, her mother carries a basket with dry henna covered with a cloth, and escorts Merav to her seat on the stage.

Merav's intended, Hanan, in a ceremonial wedding robe, including a cap with long curls (payot) attached.Merav is dressed in customary Yemenite dress for the pre-nuptial henna ceremony.

Eager to give meaning to the ceremony, Mazal explains the importance of the special songs to her guests, the flowers and candles, which are meant to light Merav's way to her new life, and the henna ceremony itself.

"Hinne is an acronym for three mitzvot that a young married woman performs: havrashah challot – separating a piece of the challah dough for the priests; niddah – observing the laws of purity; and nerot – lighting the Sabbath candles. The application of henna, she explains, is thought to engender good fortune, happiness and protection against the evil eye and, accordingly, is applied during times of potentially difficult transitional events, such as birth and marriage.

Merav's grandmother then pours water onto the dry henna and mixes it with her hands until the mixture becomes a brown (later a dark red) paste. Family members and friends take turns dipping a finger in the henna and then dabbing it on Merav's palm, while giving the bride-to-be their blessing. Some bless her with a life filled with Torah, chesed and spirituality, while others bless her with good health, happiness and love, and a righteous home in Israel.

As a grownup it is not often you can cover yourself in the mud and get away with it… but, at Haldimand Hills Spa Village's Ste. Anne's in Grafton, Ont. - it's encouraged.

"Ste. Anne's is the only place in Canada where you can have a full immersion Moor Mud Bath. We use our special blend combining Saskatchewan Clay and Ontario Golden Moor Mud. The nutrients of the mud help to increase circulation and aids in detoxification.

"We have two separate tubs in the same room so that couples can experience this together. The treatment ends with the couple hosing each other clean," explains Brittany Cadence, marketing manager for Haldimand Hills Spa Village.

This premier spa destination also offers exotic massage treatments such as an invigorating Thai Massage, Deluxe Reflexology and Aroma Stone Massage using warm basalt stones and essential oils to draw out impurities, stretch out muscles and relieve the body's stress.

Ste. Anne's esthetic services using Aveda products include Intensive Pedicure, Intensive Manicure, Hydrating Paraffin Facial, Earth Stone Facial and body treatments such as Eucalyptus Body Wrap and Aqua Polish that uses a high pressure Scotch hose, exfoliates with a sea salt or a body polish with walnuts and finishes with the client lying on a table under Vichy Shower with multiple showerheads.

"We have a fitness facility called Maison Santé with an indoor therapeutic pool, whirlpool, sauna and the latest cybex and spinning equipment. We offer group fitness classes and personal trainers for individual programs such as Guided Meditation and De-stress with a Breath, where you learn through relaxed breathing and visualizations ways of getting in-tune with yourself," she says.

Ste. Anne's sits on 570 acres, with 12 guest rooms in the main estate and spa cottages. You can rent a cottage suite or an entire cottage for groups. Amenities include tennis courts, nature trails, an outdoor pool and an outside grotto with a hot tub, cold plunge and current pools.

The Executive Stress Express is an all inclusive day spa package with train and limousine service catering to business people wanting a quick getaway.

On December 5-7th, guests are invited to partake in Ste. Anne's first Capote Workshop. Capotes are historic blanket coats made famous by the Hudson's Bay Company. HBC staff will help guests hand-stitch a traditional coat or Voyageur Mittens using authentic HBC blankets. Cadence says working with your hands helps bring about a state of wellness and relaxation. Included during the one, two or three day workshops are hand, neck or shoulder massages to provide a break from sewing - culminating with spa treatments.

Jerusalem's mayor seeks economic aid

Makes pitch to corporate Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Uri Lupolianski

Uri Lupolianski, the recently elected mayor of Jerusalem, has enlisted corporate Canada's assistance to revitalize the city's battered economic base.

Visiting Toronto for one day last week in his first overseas trip as mayor of Israel's capital, Lupolianski confirmed that the current Palestinian uprising has devastated Jerusalem's tourist industry, "the basis of our economy."

In an exclusive interview, he said there has been a precipitous decline in the number of travellers going to Jerusalem.

Last year, Jerusalem played host to 35,000 to 40,000 foreign tourists, compared to three million in 2000, the year the intifadah erupted.

The resulting sharp decrease in business has caused widespread unemployment.

"Thousands of people – hotel and restaurant workers and taxi drivers – have lost their jobs, and workshops catering to tourists have closed," said Lupolianski, who spoke alternately in halting English or through his international affairs advisor and interpreter, Jacob Rosen.

Sombrely describing the Palestinian revolt as Israel's "biggest war," he said that about 70 per cent of the suicide bombings directed against Israel have struck Jerusalem.

"The economic fabric of Jerusalem has been very badly damaged," said Rosen, who accompanied Lupolianski on his 10-day North American trip. After leaving Toronto, he was due to fly to New York and Baltimore.

CIJA takes over

Umbrella agency sets new course

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's a done deal.

After months of backroom negotiations, the country's major Jewish advocacy organizations have signed on to a restructuring program that is intended to enhance the community's ability to present a pro-Israel agenda while addressing the growth of domestic anti-Semitism.

At the centre of the restructuring process will be a new committee, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), which will set policy, review budgets and co-ordinate resources so that advocacy groups will be better able to respond to incidents as they occur while developing a course of action.

CIJA will act as a "conductor and facilitating entity," with national campus services and organizations such as Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) operating within that framework, said Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada.

Congress and the CIC will retain an independent organizational structure and "on an operational basis, they're going to have a certain level of autonomy," Finkelstein said. "But they'll be part of a larger framework where budgets are set and policies [are] made."

Congress will be responsible for domestic advocacy, the CIC for Israel-related issues.

Funding for each group in the next three years is expected to increase by a total of $5 million per year – doubling recent budgets. The funds will be raised by local federations through their annual campaigns and through special gifts.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Abella, Weston Honoured

TORONTO — Ontario Court of Appeal Judge Rosalie Abella and former Ontario lieutenant-governor Hilary Weston received the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews' (CCCJ) Human Relations Award last week at the CCCJ's 56th annual awards dinner. It's the first time two women have won the prize, which honours people who have made outstanding contributions to Canadian society across religious, racial or ethnic lines.

ISRAEL

Right-wing Peace Plan

JERUSALEM — Israeli right wingers are drafting an initiative aimed at countering other peace plans. Backed by settler leaders and hawkish Likud Party members, it would create a binational state with a Jewish prime minister and, possibly, a Palestinian deputy prime minister. It would also reject a separate Palestinian state and dismantle the Palestinian Authority. To prevent a Palestinian parliamentary majority, Israel, the West Bank and Gaza would be split into cantons, with representation not necessarily set according to population. The plan comes after two left-wing peace plans and reports Prime Minister Ariel Sharon might evacuate settlements.

Missiles to India

JERUSALEM — Israel Aircraft Industries is set to sell India $100 million (US) worth of SS Barak missiles to protect Indian warships. It would be the parties' third such deal.

Israel Seizes Dolls

JERUSALEM — Israeli customs officials seized 400 Osama bin Laden and 50 Saddam Hussein dolls last week, saying they could incite violence. An Israeli Arab businessman said he ordered them from China to sell as joke gifts.

WORLD

Morocco Jails Nine

CASABLANCA — Morocco has jailed nine people in connection with the Sept. 11 murder of Jewish lumber merchant Albert Rebibo in Casablanca. Police believe he was murdered by an Islamist cell. One man, an ex-policeman, was sentenced to 20 years, the others for between two and 15 years. None of those jailed is believed to have been among the gunmen.

Funds Sought for Care

JERUSALEM — The Claims Conference will urge Germany to pay for home care of ailing Holocaust survivors around the world. The decision came at a Claims Conference executive meeting last week in Jerusalem.

SS Guard Ordered Out

DETROIT — A U.S. judge last week ordered the deportation of a former SS guard who served at the Mauthausen concentration camp in 1943 and 1944. The judge said Johann Leprich, 77, lied about his past when he immigrated to the United States in 1952. Leprich was arrested in July when he was found hiding under the basement stairs at his family's home in Clinton, Mich., near Detroit. He fled to Canada in 1987 after losing his U.S. citizenship, but evidence later surfaced that he continued to live secretly in the United States.

EU Study Shelved

BERLIN — A study by the European Union on anti-Semitism in Europe was not released earlier this year for political reasons, reportedly because it found that Muslims, as well as right-wing extremists, were largely to blame for anti-Semitic incidents in May and June 2002, British news reports said. As well, there may have been problems separating anti-Israel activity from anti-Semitism. The European Monitoring Center on Racism and Xenophobia said the findings would be part of a larger study to be done next year.

Cartoon Gets Award

LONDON — A cartoon of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon eating a baby that critics said was reminiscent of blood libels against Jews throughout history was honoured by Britain's Political Cartoon Society last week as the top political cartoon of the year. The society's founder, Tim Benson, who is Jewish, said it is "a criticism of [Sharon] and his party," but is not anti-Semitic. Britain's Press Complaints Commission rejected complaints about the cartoon, which was published in January by the Independent, the award's sponsor. In accepting the prize, cartoonist Dave Brown thanked the Israeli embassy in London for its angry reaction, saying it gave the drawing publicity.

Resolution Withdrawn

NEW YORK — Israel said last week it withdrew its first resolution at the United Nations since 1976 because Arab countries rewrote it in committee, making it anti-Israel. The document, which expressed concern for Israeli children living under the threat of Palestinian terrorism, was to be voted on in the General Assembly's committee on human rights. It followed the passage of an Egyptian-sponsored resolution expressing concern over Palestinian children living under occupation. "We put the UN to the test, to test the morality of the UN, and the UN failed," said Dan Gillerman, Israel's UN ambassador.

Pastor Tries to 'Save' Western Canadian Jews

REGINA — Local Jews and Canadian Jewish Congress have criticized a Regina pastor after he mailed hundreds of letters earlier this month to people with Jewish-sounding names urging them to accept the New Testament and "get saved."

Rev. William Cicansky of the three-year-old BibleWay Baptist Church said he sent the letters – addressed "Dear Jewish friend" – to people he found in the Regina, Saskatoon, Winnipeg and Vancouver phone books.

Allan Dolovich, president of Saskatoon's Congregation Shir Chadash, told the Saskatoon StarPhoenix he is "offended by anything that suggests that our faith is, in some way, less than what it should be, or substandard."

Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director of community relations, told CBC Regina that while he respects Christians' right to proselytize, targeting one group is offensive. "It's hurtful because the implication is that being a practising Jew is somehow not sufficient. The message that it's saying to Jewish people is that your faith is inferior and your faith is incomplete unless you convert."

Cicansky told the StarPhoenix he's not sure exactly how many people got the letters, but said he has mailed such letters in the past and will do so again. He told CBC that "political correctness" is to blame for the negative reaction to them.

Lawsuit fights retroactive repeal of EETC

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Ontario's Jewish community is closely monitoring a court challenge that seeks to stop passage of the new Liberal government's bill that would repeal the Equity in Education Tax Credit.

Canadian Jewish Congress is not party to the challenge being mounted by the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools (OACS), which went to court last week seeking an injunction aimed at stopping the repeal of the EETC.

But CJC is watching the case and considering whether to become an intervenor, Ontario region chair Ed Morgan told The CJN.

A judge in the Ontario Superior Court of Justice reserved judgment last Thursday after a day of pleadings from the OACS and lawyers for the government.

If passed, the legislation would eliminate the EETC retroactive to Jan. 1, 2003, cancelling the credit's benefits for the current school year and even part of the 2002-2003 academic year. It would also roll back corporate tax cuts and raise cigarette taxes.

The OACS argues that in cancelling the EETC, the Liberals are not following due process under the 1999 Taxpayer Protection Act, which sought to stop tax increases unless they're approved in a province-wide referendum. The retroactive rollback effectively puts extra money in the government's coffers, the alliance contends.

The OACS wants an injunction to prevent the government from debating the legislation.

Morgan said although the chances of winning an injunction to freeze a government bill are remote, it's worth a shot.

Sokolsky named new president of UJA Federation

Ted Sokolsky

Ted Sokolsky has been appointed the new president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, succeeding Allan Reitzes, who is stepping down in January.

Sokolsky, who joined UJA Federation in 1986, has served as assistant campaign director, campaign director and, most recently, as vice-president, integrated fundraising.

A committee chaired by Ralph Shedletsky selected Sokolsky after consulting community members on the qualities required for a president. The committee enlisted the assistance of recruitment services provided by United Jewish Communities, the umbrella organization for North American Jewish federations.

"Ted was selected for his visionary leadership and his internationally acclaimed track record of accomplishments," said UJA Federation chair Leslie Gales. "We couldn't find a better person to chart our course in the 21st century."

Reitzes, who first joined UJA Federation as budget director in 1982 and succeeded Steve Ain as president in 1992, said, "Ted's dedication, dynamism and leadership strength will serve UJA Federation well on the local, national and international stage."

Gales said, "I've known Allan for nearly 20 years and I've always admired his devotion to professionalism, his sensitivity to the needs of all community members and the way in which he calmly steered us through many periods of crisis."

Jerusalem GA notes (2)

From the editor's desk

This week I continue with some of my observations from the four-day General Assembly (GA) of the United Jewish Communities of North America in Jerusalem last month.

* * *

Monday, Nov. 17.

After an inspiring tribute to the Israel Defence Forces, which concluded with an emotional impromptu mother and son reunion, the delegates gathered outside the conference centre in the waning, late afternoon Jerusalem light.

We were assembling for the GA Solidarity March into downtown Jerusalem. It was approximately 4:30 p.m.

As the sun receded behind the slope of the western hills, the air became decidedly cooler. Sunset arrived quickly. But the abrupt transition to evening mattered not at all to the thousands of excited North Americans readying themselves for the kilometre-plus walk into the heart of the city.

Like the children of Israel who marched through the desert of Zin bearing the flags of their ancestral tribes, we too carried the standards and the distinct colours of our respective communities.

The sheer number of people waiting for the signal to march; the playful, spirited presence of so many college students; and the palpable, near-metaphysical, charge of seeing and "feeling" Jerusalem ubiquitous, in every direction, stirred in us a sense of special occasion and of historical moment.

Then the march began. The boisterous Canadian delegation walked in the middle of the large throng. From the venue of the GA, Binyanei Ha'oumah, which sits high atop a promontory in Jerusalem's western hills, we walked east toward the Old City, literally descending the slope down Jaffa Road.

Readers familiar with Jerusalem will know that Jaffa Road is one of the city's main east-west arteries. Its name derives from the fact that it was the road ancient and modern Jerusalemites would travel to the Mediterranean port of Jaffa. In Jerusalem, the streets ends – or begins – at the Jaffa Gate, one of the eight gates to the Old City.

Jaffa Road is a noisy street, almost always busy with pedestrian and vehicular traffic, lined throughout its length with stores and small businesses. In addition, most of the inter-city buses enter Jerusalem on Jaffa Road because the city's central bus station is nearby – not far from Binyanei Ha'oumah.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the Palestinian suicide bombers have frequently targeted Jaffa Road buses.

But suicide bombers and terrorism were far from our minds as we joyfully walked in decidedly non-military, haphazard formation down Jaffa Road.

The street was decorated with GA flags and posters. The festoonery of colours would have been even more spectacular had we been marching during the day, under Jerusalem's unique blue-sky canopy.

But if our procession lacked eye-catching, bright colour, it overflowed with festive, celebratory atmosphere. Behind us, a group of youngsters were singing. Ahead of us, some enthusiasts were pounding out a rhythmic walking beat on a set of drums.

It was very quickly apparent to us that not only were we part of this amazing parade, but we were also on parade.

Jerusalemites lined the streets,waving, greeting us with smiles, some blowing kisses, all of them cheering us on with words, expressions and gestures of welcome. Many of them joined our ranks.

Some 20 minutes into the march, we veered south toward Agrippas Street, the street, I assume, named after one of the two descendants of King Herod. Agrippas is a much narrower thoroughfare that runs parallel to Jaffa Road and boasts some of Jerusalem's least assuming but finest bakeries and restaurants.

To get to Agrippas, we walked through Jerusalem's famous open air market, Machane Yehuda, a wonderland warren of intersecting alleyways, booths, shops, kiosks, foodstuffs and smells. The entry points to the market are now controlled by security guards with metal detectors, the bitter harvest, alas, of the suicide bombings that have sprouted here.

Along the way, I stopped at a sweets and candy kiosk owned by the Eliahu Brothers, a family that many years ago found its way to Israel from Iraq. I loaded up on assorted teas, chocolate bars, rolled sheets of pressed apricot and supersweet hunks of halvah that made perfect, exotic gifts for friends in Toronto.

While on Agrippas Street, I saw an old acquaintance from Montreal who was on sabbatical from the Université de Québec. He and his wife were perched, precariously it seemed to me, upon the base of a light standard, looking out, with obvious excitement and happiness, upon the thousands of GA marchers walking past their lookout, wending their way slowly toward Kikar Tzion, or Zion Square.

We could not embrace as it would have meant my pulling him down from his elevated perch. But through animated conversation and the exchange of good wishes, we "embraced" nonetheless. Our emotions ran high, as did our feelings for Jerusalem and its courageous people, among and with whom on this wonderful evening it was a privilege to be walking. —MBD

BETH EMETH MISSION: On a recent mission to Israel, participants from Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation were welcomed at Laniado Hospital in Netanya. They were given a tour of the hospital, as well as the new children's medical centre scheduled to be opened in 2004. Two plaques were unveiled during their visit and two rooms were dedicated, one in memory of Arthur Anisman by his brother David, family and friends, and the second by members of Beth Emeth.

Wagner faces his family's anti-Semitic past

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

It is hard to imagine a more controversial musician than 19th-century German composer Richard Wagner.

Wagner, who was known mainly for his operatic works, was also notorious for his fiercely anti-Semitic views. Both his music and his writings were appropriated by the Nazis.

In Twilight of the Wagners: The Unveiling of a Family's Legacy (Picador USA, 1999, translation by Della Couling), Wagner's great-grandson, Gottfried Wagner, describes a family history where art and politics combined to form a culture that produced the Holocaust.

Gottfried Wagner's pilgrimage begins with his discovery of his great-grandfather's essays, written in the anti-Semitic intellectual heyday of the 1850s. In his writings, Richard Wagner described the Jews as repulsive foreigners and encouraged Europeans to rid themselves of the curse by destroying them.

Gottfried Wagner, who was born in 1947, says in his book that his great-grandfather's views are hard to separate from his childhood discoveries of newsreels and diaries that show his parents and grandmother were friends of Adolf Hitler. The Wagner family were clearly part of the political and social elite of Germany's Third Reich who congregated regularly in the Wagnerian cultural home in the town of Bayreuth, where the annual opera festival remains a national event.

It soon became apparent to Wagner that Hitler embraced his great-grandfather's writings as the cultural basis for his Final Solution and included Wagner's music in his parades and films.

In the book, Wagner says the family markets their heritage by maintaining tight control over operatic performances in Germany and by the manipulation of a history in which they present themselves as innocent bystanders to Hitler's atrocities.

In some cases, he argues, lovers of Wagner's music attempt to redeem the composer from his past by presenting the family as philo-Semites and pointing to appearances made by Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim in Bayreuth. Barenboim's longtime attempts to promote Wagner's music have caused widespread controversy in Israel, where there is an unspoken taboo against the composer. He caused an outcry when he led the Berlin Staatskapelle in a selection from the opera Tristan und Isolde at the 2001 Israel Festival.

Gottfried Wagner, who will be in Toronto next week as part of Music Reborn, a Royal Conservatory of Music weekend event devoted to the Holocaust, is one of the founders of the Post-Holocaust Dialogue Group. For him, German-Jewish relations can only move forward if second-generation Germans honestly confront their past by asking their parents what they did during the war.

It isn't enough that Germans have official days of remembrance, Wagner said in an interview from his home in Italy last week. Individual Germans must also face their own family histories, even when it is painful.

Ignoring family involvement in the Holocaust leads to denial, he said, pointing to a recent comment made by German parliamentarian Martin Hohmann that Jews could be seen as a "nation of perpetrators," similar to the Nazis, because of their actions in the 1917 communist revolution. Even though Hohmann was ejected from the Christian Democratic Party for the comment, an opinion poll released Nov. 13 showed that about 50 per cent of the party's supporters do not consider the statement anti-Semitic.

"Most Germans are surrounded by silence and concealment and grow up with lies and falsifications," Wagner said. "This is especially true of those who grew up in East Germany, where Hitler and the Third Reich were never discussed."

Unfortunately, he said, "facing truth can be very painful and sometimes split families." Wagner and his father, Wolfgang, who heads the Bayreuth Wagner legacy, have not been in touch for many years.

Gottfried Wagner said second-generation Germans must develop an honest historical consciousness that is based on shame rather than guilt, adding that this consciousness must come slowly in order to prevent disengagement.

Wagner is currently working on an opera with Yehuda Nir based on Nir's memoir titled The Lost Childhood. The work brings together a survivor and a Nazi descendent in an attempt to honestly confront the German descent into genocide and only then venture into the realm of forgiveness.

Wagner is speaking at The Royal Ontario Museum on Dec. 5 at 4:30 p.m. and at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on Dec. 7 at 10 a.m. Admission is free.

Conservative expert says Halachah 'not infinitely elastic'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

How elastic is Jewish law? Rabbi Joel Roth answers that question with an ease that confirms he's on familiar ground.

If you compare Halachah to a rubber band, "you can stretch it to the point where, when you release it, it comes back," says the Jewish Theological Seminary professor of Talmud and Jewish law. "If you stretch it beyond that point, you've stretched it too far.

"Halachah is very elastic, but not infinitely elastic," Rabbi Roth told The CJN in an interview at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, one of five Toronto congregations at which he spoke during a three-day visit late last month.

He also spoke to high school students at both branches of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and was keynote speaker at this year's Torah in Toronto, an annual United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism adult education event held this year at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Rabbi Roth, who wrote the 1983 responsum that enabled women to become rabbis in the Conservative movement, said that halachic elasticity "means that one generation could render decisions that would be unrecognizable by an earlier generation… but it doesn't mean that anything anybody wants to do can happen just because they want it to happen. It has to be defensible within the halachic system."

Rabbi Joel Roth

The rabbi is serving as co-chair of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's new committee set up to examine ways of reinforcing the centrality of Halachah in the Conservative movement.

He said the biggest misconception about Conservative Judaism is that Conservative Jews can choose which laws to keep. Much of his work in more than three decades in the rabbinate has been devoted to educating the laity of the Conservative movement about the "critical and central" role of Halachah.

But the thorniest halachic issue currently facing the Conservative movement has to do with homosexual behaviour, an issue expected to be addressed at the movement's law committee retreat next March.

"I can see no halachic way that can legitimate homosexual behaviour as halachically acceptable," said Rabbi Roth. "That has nothing to do with the value of the people who are gay. It has nothing to do with the reality that I know gays don't choose to be gay – which is not the same as saying God made them that way. I'm not 100 per cent convinced of that."

Rabbi Roth's views differ markedly from those of his colleague Rabbi Elliot Dorff, a philosophy professor at the Conservative movement's University of Judaism in Los Angeles. The rabbis, both of whom serve on the movement's committee on Jewish law and standards, led a panel discussion on the issue at the Conservative movement's biennial convention in Dallas in October.

At the panel, Rabbi Dorff said he wants the movement's committee on Jewish law and standards to reinterpret the laws – based on moral and medical considerations – to sanction monogamous homosexual relationships by offering Jewish commitment ceremonies and to encourage committed, same-sex couples to consider adoption, the use of surrogates and artificial insemination to replenish the dwindling Jewish population.

Rabbi Roth believes the issue could split the movement and sees "no great benefit" to its being discussed now. "Nothing has changed either halachically or scientifically" in the 12 years since it was last studied, he said.

In 1992, the law committee issued a consensus statement that said Conservative rabbis would not perform same-sex commitment ceremonies nor admit avowed homosexuals to the rabbinical school or ordain them, but would assiduously avoid attempts to make gays uncomfortable in synagogues and advocate equality of civil rights – without recognizing the halachic legitimacy of homosexual behaviour.

Rabbi Roth said he's not prepared to state in a public document that same-sex monogamous relationships are preferable to promiscuous ones in case it appears that he endorses such relationships.

The issue of women's ordination was also contentious, said Roth, a former rabbinical school dean, recalling that some of the more "traditionalist" leaders left the movement. The rabbi believes women's ordination is halachically defensible, but he says he "cannot find any way to validate homosexual behaviour.

"I cannot conceive of any issue that will be more divisive."

Latest Annan salvo; latest UN failure

For at least 30 years, Israel and its supporters have harboured no illusions about the attitude of the United Nations towards the Jewish state or about the organization's ability to play a truly constructive role in the pursuit of Middle East peace. We saw only last week, again, very clearly, the two-faced, hypocritical approach of the UN towards Israel when the Jewish state was compelled to withdraw a General Assembly resolution seeking to protect Israeli children as well as Palestinian children from the ravages of violence and war.

The General Assembly is nothing more than a glorified speakers' corner of constant calumny against Israel, an echo chamber of reverberating slander by the Arab League, the Islamic Conference and their numerous confederates in the unceasing campaign to delegitimize the only Jewish state on earth. And its chief administrator, Secretary General Kofi Annan, alas, has allowed himself to become nothing more than the body's oft-manipulated spokesperson.

Last week Annan published a report in which he concluded that the security fence Israel is erecting is in violation of international law. It "could damage the longer-term prospects for peace," he added. "In the midst of the road map process," Annan wrote, "when each party should be making good-faith confidence-building gestures, the barrier's construction in the West Bank cannot, in this regard, be seen as anything but a deeply counterproductive act."

What sets Annan's latest salvo against Israel apart from his previous ones is neither its conclusion nor its tone. They have become all too predictable. Rather, it is its complete lack of contextual or moral positioning. He calls for confidence-building gestures within the framework of the road map. Where has he been these past months and years? The first, indeed virtually the only, obligation upon the Palestinian Authority (PA) leadership under the road map is to dismantle the structure of terror. Yet they have publicly and openly refused to do so. Annan accuses Israel of undermining long-term prospects for peace. Yet can he name even a single step the PA leadership has taken to enhance any prospects for peace – short, medium or long term?

The security fence is a last-gasp, defensive measure by Israel to protect its citizens. It was born of overwhelming desperation, a dispiriting concession to the bitter truth that Israelis feel no hope of reaching a settlement with the current Palestinian leadership. The majority of Israelis support the security fence.

To be sure, questions about the route of the fence are legitimate. But illegitimate is the brazen double standard that questions Israel's right to do what every other country on earth does, namely, erect barriers to ensure the safety of its own citizens.

The fact that, once again, it is the secretary general of the UN who applies the double standard is further proof of the UN's abject failure to help bring the parties closer to peace.

UN disappoints again

The news last week that Israel was forced to withdraw its United Nations resolution regarding the protection and safeguarding of its innocent children from numerous terrorist attacks is extremely disappointing and disheartening. Does the UN General Assembly really believe the lives of Israeli children are worth less than those of other children in the world? The fact that Egypt, which now has a peace treaty with Israel, introduced the absurd amendments (causing Israel to withdraw its resolution) and asked countries such as Malaysia, Bahrain, Saudi Arabia and Sudan, whose own children have also been under attack by terrorists to support them, is absurd and beyond comprehension.

We have been to Egypt and have seen the "carpet schools" where young children, ranging in age from six to eight years old, are forced to work. We were told that the children willingly attend. These schools are well-known to be nothing more than child labour institutions! What gives Egypt the right to even suggest that Israeli children should not be protected? Israel, the only democracy in the Middle East, not only cares deeply for its own children, but about all children living in Israel. On a visit to the pediatric ward at Hadassah Ein Kerem in Jerusalem, we saw Palestinian children being cared for compassionately and lovingly by professional and volunteer staff. It is a remarkable sight to watch the mothers of both Palestinians and Israelis caring for each other's children.

We urge the UN's secretary general to act responsively and humanely.

Claims Conference ignores survivors

Sam Bloch's article "Conference Aids Survivors, Preserves Shoah Legacy" (CJN, Nov. 20) is a page taken from the Claims Conference's mantra that has been disseminated in North America and Europe by its public relations apparatus. The Frankfurter Rundschau of Oct. 24, for example, echoes the mantra when it informs its readers that "the Jewish Claims Conference uses the money [from unclaimed property sales] mainly for the social care of Holocaust victims and their descendants."

Documentary and circumstantial evidence, however, demonstrate that large sums of monies have been allocated to non-Holocaust enterprises, both in aid and education, giving lie to Bloch's assertions.

From Brooklyn to Boston, Toronto to Tel Aviv, the voices of survivors tell a tale of sorrow. A daily posthumous victory is handed to Hitler when a survivor dies of want.

Holocaust funds dispute can be resolved

The longstanding dispute between the survivors' organizations and the Claims Conference over allegations that Claims Conference's allocations funds are transferred to non-Holocaust related undertakings ("Claims Conference is on trial," "Conference aids survivors, preserves Shoah legacy," CJN, Nov. 20) can be resolved by appointing an independent inquiry committee that would have access to all the relevant documents held by the Claims Conference.

Language inappropriate for CJN

I must express deep concern about the appearance of very vulgar words in your publication ("University paper pulled after anti-Semitic comment," CJN, Nov. 27).

The CJN has never descended to such language before and it is inappropriate for a family paper.

Our elderly parents

Etta Ginsberg McEwan's letter ("Our elderly parents," Letters to the editor, CJN, Nov. 13), in which she calls the title of our recent lecture "Parenting your parent" at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care demeaning, is totally inappropriate and misleading.

In fact, as the co-authors of the book Parenting Your Parents: Support Strategies for Meeting the Challenge of Aging in the Family, we are staunch advocates of sensitive, loving relationships with elderly parents. And that is precisely the message we delivered to an appreciative audience attending the lecture.

Just as our parents gave all they could to nurture and help us through our formative years, we are now in the position to help them in their most challenging years. It goes without saying that this is a respectful and loving process of caring for their well-being and safety.

Considering Ginsberg McEwan never attended the lecture and obviously has never opened the book, she might benefit from the old but wise adage, "You can't judge a book by its cover."

Queries Cotler

I understand that outgoing Prime Minister Jean Chrétien wants to etch his name in the annals of history as he leaves politics, but what is Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler's reasoning for favouring the legalization of same sex-marriage? I strongly doubt that a majority of his constituents favour same sex-marriage, whether it is performed in a civil or religious ceremony.

Worrisome echoes of a dark past

By AMNON RUBINSTEIN

According to Jewish philosopher Emil Fackenheim, Jew hatred has three stages. In the first stage, the message is you can't live among us as Jews; in the second, it's you can't live among us; and in the third, it's you can't live. The first stage is coerced conversion, the second is expulsion and the third is destruction.

The message of the fourth stage is you can't live in your own country.

In the 1930s, the streets of Germany filled with two kinds of graffiti: "Jews Out" and "Jews to Palestine."

Anti-Israel demonstation in London earlier this year [C. Devorah photo]

But the call of the new anti-Semitism of our age is "Jews out of Palestine." It is characteristic not only of the traditional Israel haters but also – and mostly – of circles dubbed as "the left" nowadays, in Israel, Europe and among "liberal" Americans.

The absurd thing is that negating Israel's right to exist – which provides the intellectual backing for threatening its destruction – is espoused in the name of doctrines of human rights and equality. In other words, all nations have the right to self-determination – except the Jews. There is no substantial difference between that and the first stage of traditional anti-Semitism according to Fackenheim: "You can't live among us as a member of the family of nations."

The fact that the extremist intellectual left is now carrying the banner once hefted by the fascist right in Europe is as traumatic for many contemporary Jews as it was in the late 19th century. True, there are no pogroms and no Dreyfus trial, but when the chief rabbi of France, Joseph Sitruk, goes on radio to tell Jews to avoid wearing a skullcap in public, it is a call that should shock the most secular Jews to their core.

The European Social Forum, meanwhile, invites anti-Semitic Muslim intellectual Tarek Ramadan to join its ranks, and the left in general inspires only deep disappointment when it does not demonstrate alongside Jews who are afraid to wear a skullcap and are killed at prayer in synagogues.

Those not tainted with fashionable academic ignorance today, who read early Zionist thinkers and philosophers Moshe Lilienblum and Yehuda Leib Pinsker, cannot help but feel deep identification with those two writers. It's not only Jews who are hurt by the combination of extremist Muslims and anti-Semitic leftists.

The French press – including a media very critical of Israel – is shocked by what has happened.

On Nov. 18, Le Monde justifiably praised the rapid response of President Jacques Chirac, who called a special session of his cabinet, after arsonists struck a Jewish school in Paris on Nov. 15. The newspaper warned of the danger in the combination of violent Islamic anti-Semitism and traditional French anti-Semitism.

Le Figaro, on Nov. 17, drew a connection between the events in Istanbul and Paris and the public opinion poll in which Europeans ranked Israel as the leading country endangering world peace. The newspaper added that the greatest success of the new anti-Semitism is its very banalization.

Gerard Dupuy, writing in Liberation on Nov. 17, opens an editorial on the Turkish bombings with this stunning statement: "In 2003, a person can be killed simply for being Jewish – in Istanbul, Jerba and Casablanca." He adds that anyone trying to explain the anti-Semitism, if not justify it, in the context of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is making a moral mistake, because it is a murderous trend, rooted in Muslim society, and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is just an excuse for it.

Anti-Israel sentiments in Dublin [C. Devorah photo]

French-Jewish jurist Robert Badinter, a former justice minister and now a socialist senator, was bitter in an interview with a Catholic publication about how the new anti-Semitism is disguised as anti-Zionism.

And German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder announced a special session of the European Council on Peace and Security to discuss the issue of the new anti-Semitism in the spring.

Maybe those same Israeli leftists who dismiss the charges about signs of the new anti-Semitism should read these articles that appeared overseas.

Just some of the incidents

- Marseille (Wednesday, Nov. 26)

Swastikas were daubed on Jewish shops in southern France. The swastikas were found in the morning on the outside of a Jewish photography studio and bookshop in Marseille, as well as on a number of walls close to the city's main synagogue. About 70,000 Jews live in Marseille, the second largest Jewish community in France.
